The probate court has the power to hear and determine all controversies with respect to the inventory and appraisal;²⁵ and intervention by a court of equity in such matters is not favored.²⁶ The court of probate jurisdiction has power to compel the filing of an inventory and appraisal,²⁷ and to order that particular property be removed from,²⁸ or added to,²⁹ the inventory; but it has been held that the inventory or appraisal cannot be attacked directly in a proceeding for that purpose and that issues with respect to them must await the accounting proceedings.³⁰ The court has the power to direct a reappraisal where the appraisal does not appear to be correct,³¹ or where the original appraisal was fraudulent.³²

The probate court has jurisdiction, in proceedings for an inventory, to determine whether property belongs prima facie to the estate, so that it should be included in the inventory.³³ In some jurisdictions it has the power to determine the ultimate question of ownership of property as between decedent's estate and an adverse claimant;³⁴ but in others, it does not have such power,³⁵ unless the question is purely one of law,³⁶ or the dispute as to ownership is between the estate and the representative in his

Incidental issues

The probate court has jurisdiction to determine the amount of money and property that has come into the administrator's hands, and, in determining that question, to determine all issues necessarily incidental thereto.—In re Roach's Estate, 281 P. 607, 208 Cal. 394.

Ancillary executor

Probate court has power to order correction of ancillary executors' inventory of property of decedent's estate.—Security-First Nat. Bank v. King, 23 P.2d 851, 46 Wyo. 59, 90 A.L.R. 125.

Whether court commissioner had jurisdiction to enter order eliminating amount of deceased's savings bank deposit from inventory of his estate's assets after expiration of time for appeal from order bringing such amount into inventory was for commissioner to determine in first instance.—In re Rabie's Estate, Wash., 90 P.2d 1011.

Cost bond

To assert that property, claimed by administrator in his own right, belongs to decedent's estate, person interested therein must proceed under statute requiring one petitioning for order to inventory property as assets of estate to file bond for costs.—Rosenfield v. Rosenfield, 6 N. E.2d 938, 212 Ind. 120.

Death of administrator does not terminate the court's jurisdiction of an action to compel him to include certain property in the inventory.—Fulford v. Fulford, 137 A. 487, 153 Md. 81.

Statute not invalid

Constitutional provision for separation of executive and judicial functions is not violated by statute empowering court to require personal representative to file inventory.—State v. Rogers, 163 S.E. 416, 111 W.Va. 587.

Waiver of objection to jurisdiction

When a coexecutor filed in the orphans' court a petition to compel the representatives of his deceased coexecutor to file an inventory and render an accounting, and to pay over to petitioner any sum remaining in the hands of deceased coexecutor, any question of jurisdiction was waived by the act of the representatives of the coexecutor in filing the inventory, and it was too late to make the question after petitioner had excepted to the inventory as filed.—Crothers v. Crothers, 88 A. 114, 121 Md. 114.

Equivalence to action in equity

The petition of legatee of estate to have note stricken from inventory and that it be not charged against his share of estate is equivalent to an action in equity to set aside and cancel the instruments.—In re Flierl's Estate, 274 N.W. 422, 225 Wis. 493.

Remedy by motion to strike or claim against estate

Where deceased husband invested joint funds of spouses in notes and mortgages running to spouses jointly and such items were shown in inventory of husband's estate, wife properly petitioned to strike the items from inventory instead of filing claim for conversion against estate; but where he invested joint funds in note payable to him alone, wife's remedy, on his death, was filing of claim against estate for conversion, by deceased, of her interest in note, not petition to have note stricken from inventory.—In re Abdulah's Estate, 252 N.W. 158, 214 Wis. 336.

Who may bring proceeding; parties. The court, in compelling the filing of an inventory and appraisal, may act of its own motion,³⁸ or on the petition of one interested in the estate as an heir, devisee, or creditor;³⁹ persons not interested in the estate cannot apply for the filing of an inventory.⁴⁰ A person's status as interested party need not be adjudicated as a preliminary to filing a petition.⁴¹ A petition setting forth facts which, if true, show the petitioner to be interested in the estate is sufficient,⁴² even though such facts are disputed, in which case the court may require petitioner to show his interest to its satisfaction.⁴³ It has been held that a joint executor or administrator who is obstructed by his associates in the performance of his duty to make a true inventory should take proceedings to enforce the making of it.⁴⁴

In a proceeding by a creditor to compel the inventory of property in the possession of a third person, such person is a necessary party to the proceedings.⁴⁵

Time to bring proceeding. The right to require an inventory may generally be enforced at any time before final settlement of the administration accounts,⁴⁶ although lapse of time in connection with other circumstances may be sufficient ground for denying the application for an inventory.⁴⁷ While the correctness of the inventory can be put in issue at the accounting, the parties need not wait until then to raise the issue.⁴⁸ A statute limiting the time within which persons interested in the estate may file exceptions to the inventory does not apply to one claiming ownership of property included in the inventory.⁴⁹

Pleading. In a proceeding to compel a representative to inventory certain property, the petition, interrogatories, and answers thereto constitute the pleadings;⁵⁰ and a representative claiming such property must establish his title thereto on the allegations of his pleadings.⁵¹ A petition averring that the inventory made by the administrator was not true, and that certain described property belonging to decedent was not included, and also averring that it is filed by an heir, is sufficient to state a cause of action to require the administrator to include the property.⁵² A complaint for an additional inventory, which alleges that a particular description of the notes and credits which it is sought to have included in the additional inventory cannot be obtained because the executor has suppressed and destroyed all evidence concerning them, states a sufficient excuse for not specifically describing the property.⁵³ In proceedings against an administrator to compel him to include certain claims in his list of debts as administrator, the facts alleged in the answer must be taken as true if the case is submitted on the petition and answer.⁵⁴

ciency of evidence have been applied in proceedings involving inventory and appraisal.⁵⁵ Since the inventory is presumed to be correct, one attacking it has the burden of proof.⁵⁶ Where the representative admits receiving certain property from decedent, the burden is on him to establish that it is not property of the estate.⁵⁷

Questions for jury; instructions. In a proceeding to compel the inventory of certain property as assets of the estate, whether there was a gift from decedent to the administrator was held a question for the jury.⁵⁸

Where the issue is submitted to a jury, the court should properly instruct it as to the law.⁵⁹

Review. A final order respecting inventory or appraisal,⁶⁰ or an order affecting a substantial right,⁶¹ has been held appealable; an order refusing to compel an inventory is usually reviewable on appeal,⁶² although it has been held that there is no authority for a review of an order for an appraisal.

al.⁶³ On the other hand, certain judgments, orders, or decrees directing the filing of inventories have been held interlocutory and therefore not appealable.⁶⁴

A party not aggrieved by an order with respect to the inventory or appraisal,⁶⁵ or a party consenting to such an order,⁶⁶ cannot appeal from it. An appeal from an order as to the inventory or appraisal must be taken within the time provided by the statute.⁶⁷

Other holdings with respect to review will be found in the note.⁶⁸

§ 137. Defects and Amendment or Correction

68. Certiorari

In absence of showing that an application was ever presented to county court to require community administrator to present new appraisal, petitioner could not maintain certiorari proceeding to revise inventory and appraisal on ground appraised value of community property was insufficient.—Morris v. Williams, Tex.Civ.App., 92 S.W.2d 541, error refused.

Review on appeal from subsequent order

A court commissioner's order, eliminating amount of deceased's savings bank deposit from inventory of his estate's assets, became final adjudication, where not taken before superior court for revision or appealed from, and is not reviewable by supreme court on appeal from superior court's order setting aside former order.—In re Rabie's Estate, Wash., 90 P.2d 1011.

Parties to appeal

Appeal by corporation from order dismissing its petition for order requiring administrators to turn certain property over to it, was not required to be taken as against creditors who had filed petition to dismiss, where administrators had filed answer, since administrators were "proper and necessary parties" to proceedings, and they represented interests of creditors and of all other persons concerned.—Talbot Packing Corporation v. As incident to substantial relief Forced heir cannot obtain amendment of inventories fixed by appraisers, except in suit which has for its object some substantial relief or result, such as reduction of excessive donation or legacy, or determination of disposable portion of estate.—Succession of Vance, 164 So. 792, 183 La. 760.

On appeal from probate court

The superior court had jurisdiction, on appeal from probate court, to grant executor permission to amend his inventory if the circumstances of the case justified such ac-

an honest mistake or an inadvertent omission.⁷⁰ However, the court may refuse to permit an amendment where the matter is one that can be more adequately investigated at the accounting.⁷¹

An erroneous appraisal cannot be corrected after filing, the remedy being to set it aside.⁷²

§ 138. Operation and Effect

The inventory and appraisal are prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of the value and ownership of the items of property included. The listing of property, or failure to list it, does not affect the true title.

The inventory returned by the personal representative is prima facie evidence as to the items included therein and their respective values, and as to the total of the estate comprised within the jurisdiction;⁷³ but it is not conclusive as to these matters, and may always be explained or shown to be incorrect,⁷⁴ where there has been no judicial de-tion.—Browning v. Liberty, 193 A. 496, 53 R.I. 507.

Relief in equity; reliance on judge
(1) Equity will grant relief to administrator who has, as result of fraud, accident, or mistake, included in his inventory property belonging to himself individually.—Henshaw v. Gunter, 87 S.W.2d 561, 169 Tenn. 305.

(2) Administrator who was induced by county judge to include in inventory notes and stock which were allegedly given by deceased as gifts to administrator, by representation that administrator's rights would be fully protected, was entitled to be relieved in equity from mistake made in including administrator's privately owned property in inventory of assets of estate.—*Henshaw v. Inventory made for undertaking

(1) Inventories and appraisements filed by administratrix and successor for purpose of fixing amount of their undertaking were held not competent evidence of value of property of estate.—Shafford v. Reed, 247 P. 324, 119 Or. 90.

(2) Appraisement of property of estate, largely for purpose of fixing amount of bonds and determining amount for which executor was accountable, did not fix value of estate in subsequent suit against residuary devisee to enforce trust in property of estate, where it is common knowledge that the value of such property has depreciated.—Platt v. Jones, 38 P.2d 703, 149 Or. 246, modified on other grounds 39 P.2d 955, 149 Or. 246.

Appraisement as evidence of property received

(1) In determining what is received by administrator, court may look to appraisement.—Hayes v. National Surety Co., 153 So. 515, 169 Miss. 676.

(2) Appraisement was no evidence against administrator in regard to accounts due estate, life insurance, and money on hand, because appraisement does not legally deal with money and choses in action, since such items are to be returned by inventory.—Hayes v. National Surety Co., supra.

(3) Widow, as administratrix de bonis non, could not be charged with entire personal property received, but only as to part not exempt, although appraisers did not set exempt property apart.—Hayes v. National Surety Co., supra.

Presumption of regularity

In action against administrator of administrator, apparent defects in appraisement, introduced to show what administrator received, were supplied by operation of presumption that incidental procedural steps which should have been taken were taken.—Hayes v. National Surety Co., supra.

Notice to legatees

Inventories made in succession were prima facie valid and were not invalidated nor rendered subject to annulment because made without notifying some of legatees named in testator's will, where inventories were not binding on legatees.—Succession of Price, 2 So.2d 29, 197 La. 579.

(1) Valuation of testator's stock made by sworn disinterested appraisers appointed by orphans' court, offered in evidence at hearing where all parties were represented by counsel, none of whom attempted to show valuation was inaccurate, was binding on parties.—Mercantile Trust Co. of Baltimore v. Schloss, 166 A. 599, 165 Md. 18.

termination of the correctness of the inventory and appraisal.⁷⁵ The representative's failure to list property owned by the estate does not affect the title;⁷⁶ nor, conversely, is the title to property not owned by the estate affected by its being included in the inventory.⁷⁷ However, it has been held ground for abatement of an action by the representative to recover property that the property was not listed in the inventory.⁷⁸

It is said that an inventory is not conclusive either for or against the personal representative,⁷⁹ and that he can assert individual ownership of assets included in the inventory.⁸⁰ On the other hand, it has been held that the representative is bound by the inventory⁸¹ unless he acted inadvertently or under an honest mistake.⁸² Where the representative

(2) Appraisement and inventory of executrix, stating that she had in her hands as executrix certain money as proceeds of check, in absence of evidence to contrary, sustained judgment holding that money was in her hands as executrix, requiring her to account to estate for it.—Williams' Adm'r v. Vonderhaar's Ex's, 89 S.W.2d 321, 262 Ky. 68.

Collateral attack

An inventory may not be impeached by a collateral attack; the proper method of correcting it is by motion, after notice, in the court where the administration case is pending.—Pennington v. Newman, 129 P. 693, 36 Okl. 594—23 C.J. p 1167 note 74.

Since inventories are not binding on legatees, they are not "estopped" from having any errors therein corrected to conform to the true facts.—Succession of Price, 2 So.2d 29, 197 La. 579.

Impeachment by any interested party
Statutory provision that administrator shall stand charged with appraisal unless he show cause to contrary, does not limit showing to one by administrator himself, but showing may be made by any proper person sought to be charged with administrator's liability.—Hayes v. National Surety Co., 153 So. 515, 169 Miss. 676.

Computation of commissions

In determining whether value of estate is over or under a certain sum for purpose of computing commissions due testamentary trustees, surrogate could inquire into facts and determine value on accounting of executors at time assets were turned over to trustees, and inventory at time of testator's death was not conclusive.—In re Heimer's Estate, 23 N.Y.S.2d 581, 175 Misc. 412.

Estoppel to contest correctness

That plaintiff and one of defendants in suit to effect a partition of community property were present when inventory of their mother's estate was made in which was included items in dispute which were also included in inventory taken in their father's estate by notary public, to which reference was made in pleadings for express purpose of giving complete description of property to be partitioned did not estop them from contesting correctness thereof where matter was never placed at issue.—Jung v. Stewart, 181 So. 867, 190 La. 91.

Miscellaneous

The fact that an executrix in her inventory in setting out the title to certain real property mentioned a paper purporting to be a life lease of the property, bearing a specified date, and signed by the testator, was not a recognition of the validity of the instrument, but only an acknowledgment of the existence of a record purporting to convey the title.—Winter v. Dibble, 95 N.E. 1093, 251 Ill. 200.

75. Ohio.—Scott v. Mofford, 28 N.E. 2d 947, 64 Ohio App. 457.

Mere acceptance of inventory by court is not an adjudication that property listed is owned by estate.—Searle v. Crampton, 170 A. 480, 118 Conn. 42.

Res judicata

A final adjudication that certain inventoried personalty was assets of decedent's estate and lawfully included in the inventory thereof in a proceeding instituted in the probate court by filing exceptions to the inventory, was "res judicata" when properly pleaded as a defense in a subsequent action by the one who in the proceeding in the probate court was executor, to engraft a trust for her use and benefit on the same personalty.—Bolles v. Toledo Trust Co., 27 N.E.2d 145, 136 Ohio St. 517, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 37, 311 U.S. 673, 85 L.Ed. 433.

Failure to object to inventory

Where an inventory is filed, signed, and sworn to by one other than administrator, where appraisal is filed, signed, and verified by appraisers, and administrator files no other inventory and appraisal treating property set out as property of estate, and does not move to strike or correct inventory and appraisal for return of another in due form, he is estopped to deny that he came into possession of property as belonging to estate.—United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Clutter, 179 P. 754, 74 Okl. 254.

Husband's action as binding wife

An inventory and appraisal was not binding on testamentary remainderman, so as to preclude remainderman from claiming that particular personalty not listed therein passed to her as part of the estate, notwithstanding that such inventory and appraisal was signed by remainderman's husband as appraiser.—Haydon v. Weltmer, Fla., 187 So. 772.

lists an asset and at the same time asserts his ownership, he is not estopped.⁸³ Since it is the representative's duty to list assets, the paper title to which was in decedent, he is not thereby estopped from asserting his individual ownership;⁸⁴ similarly, the representative is not barred from claiming listed property which he and decedent held in joint tenancy where such property must be included in the inventory for tax purposes.⁸⁵

Debts or claims may properly be inventoried as doubtful, desperate, or worthless, where the facts warrant,⁸⁶ and an item so inventoried is not prima facie a charge against the representative;⁸⁷ but a debt or claim returned at face value without comment will be presumed collected or collectable,⁸⁸ although an inventory is only prima facie evidence as to the solvency of persons indebted to the estate,⁸⁹ and before an administrator should be charged with notes marked by the appraisers on the inventory as good, there should be some proof of their collection or of negligence with respect to collection.⁹⁰ Where the representative inventories a debt owed by him to the estate, this is evidence of the existence of the debt as a valid and enforceable claim.⁹¹

An inventory filed by an executor is evidence inter alios to show his consent to the will and transmission of title thereunder.⁹²

Where an administrator buys property with the effects of his intestate and inventories it in the probate court and the inventory is recorded in that court, such record is notice of the fiduciary character of his title to the property so purchased.⁹³

The appraisal of land is not an eviction of those holding by adverse possession or a reduction to possession by the administrator,⁹⁴ nor does the mere fact that a rental proportion of certain crops growing on land owned by a devisee has been returned by the executor as part of the personal property show such an invasion of the devisee's rights as entitles him to seek redress in any judicial tribunal.⁹⁵

Where an administrator has filed an inventory and appraisal purporting to be made by him, and makes no attempt to strike it from the files or correct it, he is estopped to object to its reception in evidence against him on the ground that he failed to sign it.⁹⁶

§ 139. Dispensing with Inventory

The court has discretion to dispense with an inventory, but only for good cause, as where no assets have come within the representative's possession or charge. Apart from statute, a testamentary provision that no inventory need be filed should be disregarded.

The court, on good cause shown and in the exercise of its discretion, may dispense with an inventory.⁹⁷ An inventory may be dispensed with where all the parties in interest waive it,⁹⁸ and an inventory is unnecessary where no assets or estate have come within the representative's possession or charge,⁹⁹ although an executor's report that he received personal property from the estate is sufficient to require an inventory.¹ It may be provided by statute that an executor may give bond for the payment of debts and legacies, and thus be relieved from the duty of filing an inventory, where this is authorized by the will² or the executor is also the residuary legatee.³ An inventory and account may also be dispensed with if not applied for until after so long a period that the lapse of time, in conjunction with other circumstances, affords a reasonable presumption that there were no assets or that the estate has been fully administered;⁴ nor is the court required to order an inventory and account where it appears that the estate was duly settled and distributed among the persons entitled without any proceedings in court.⁵ An administrator personally entitled to all of the personal property need not file an inventory unless ordered to do so by the court at the instance of an interested party.⁶

On the other hand, the fact that all the personal property or its proceeds have been disposed of in the payment of debts does not render an inventory unnecessary,⁷ nor is it sufficient to excuse the filing of an inventory that the representative professes to have a large surplus over all debts and offers to deposit security sufficient to pay any debt which may be established,⁸ or that the only asset was the proceeds of an insurance policy.⁹ The making of a preliminary inventory to ascertain whether the estate is of sufficient value to authorize the granting of letters of administration does not dispense with the necessity of an inventory by an administrator subsequently appointed.¹⁰

A testamentary provision that no inventory need be filed should be disregarded by the court,¹¹ unless such a provision is validated by statute;¹² however, an executor will not be required to file an inventory except as to the personalty, where the will leaves it to his discretion and makes his appraisalment fi-

§ 140. Effect of Failure to Make

Although failure to file an inventory is a breach of the representative's duty, it does not ordinarily subject him to liability unless damage has resulted.

It appears that a mere failure to return an inventory is not alone sufficient to charge the representative absolutely with assets or debts of decedent, the question being essentially one of culpable negligence or misconduct on his part, occasioning a loss to some person in interest;¹⁴ and it has been held that such failure does not deprive the representative of his rights as such,¹⁵ or as a creditor of the estate,¹⁶ although there is also authority for the view that an administrator who has neglected to return an inventory has no authority over the personal estate.¹⁷ Nevertheless, the failure to file an inventory at the proper time amounts technically to an official delinquency or a breach of the condition of the administration bond,¹⁸ although it will not ordinarily subject the representative to any serious consequences if, on citation, he performs his duty or shows good cause why an inventory should be deferred or dispensed with.¹⁹ A failure to appraise certain property cannot affect the validity of the executor's final account, where it appears that all the property received, or which by reasonable diligence should have been received, has been punctiliously accounted for.²⁰

V. AUTHORITY AND DUTIES IN GENERAL

§ 141. General Statement

The rights, powers, and duties of a personal representative are determined by the applicable statutes and will, if any, and include the orderly and speedy administration, liquidation, and settlement of the estate.

An executor or administrator is a representative of limited authority²¹ and of continuing duties.²² The general and primary duty resting on an executor or administrator is to administer the estate in an orderly and proper manner²³ to the best advantage of all concerned,²⁴ in the case of a testate estate in accordance with the terms of the will,²⁵ and to effect a liquidation or settlement thereof²⁶ as speedily as is reasonably possible.²⁷ This involves the general duty to bury decedent, collect his effects, preserve them from waste, pay claims against the estate, and distribute the residue, if any, among those entitled, and to do all other things necessary as representative of the personal estate of decedent.²⁸

The rights, powers, and duties of an executor or administrator are generally derived from, and controlled by, statutes,²⁹ in the case of an executor or

(3) Legislature of another state cannot add to, or subtract from, duties of executor appointed pursuant to laws of state.—In re Killough's Estate, 265 N.Y.S. 301, 148 Misc. 73.

Individual and public administrator compared

(1) In all material respects, duties and liabilities of individual administrator or executor and public administrator are the same.—State ex

an administrator with the will annexed, as properly limited or extended by the terms of the will.³⁰ He has no implied powers beyond those which are necessary to the exercise of the powers which are expressly conferred on him,³¹ but, if the will authorizes the executor to do a certain thing to carry out a particular object, a resort to the ordinary and usual methods to accomplish the object comes within the scope of the power given by the will.³²

An executor whether named in the will or by delegated power has the right to defend in the courts his authority to act.³³

Fiction of identity

Executor or administrator acts in representative capacity, and by fiction of identity is the person of the testator to whom all interested parties must look.—Packer v. Overton, 203 N.W. 307, 200 Iowa 620.

Extent of representation generally

(1) Administrator stands in intestate's shoes for all purposes, unless expressly excepted by law.—Agricultural Finance Corporation v. Bates, 155 S.E. 32, 171 Ga. 230, answers to certified questions conformed to 155 S.E. 533, 42 Ga.App. 255.

(2) His representative character extends only so far as is necessary to wind up decedent's business.—Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608.

(3) After taking possession of the estate unconditionally, he is subject to all obligations and entitled to all rights of decedent.

La.—First Nat. Bank v. Lagrone, 117 So. 741, 166 La. 626.

(4) Administrator stands in right of decedent, not his creditors.—Bedsole v. Tiller, 181 So. 286, 236 Ala. 101.

(5) Executor does not represent creditors, but represents testator, and has no more right to recover property fraudulently conveyed than testator would have had.—First Nat. Bank v. Love, 167 So. 703, 232 Ala. 327.

(6) The powers of personal representative to act with relation to his decedent are confined to such matters as concern the interest of decedent.—Murray v. Physical Culture Hotel, 16 N.Y.S.2d 978, 258 App.Div. 334, affirmed 17 N.Y.S.2d 862, 258 App.Div. 334.

(7) Executors as personal representatives of decedent have power to act for him in determining, in accordance with law, what constitutes assets of the estate.—Penn v. Robertson, C.C.A.N.C., 115 F.2d 167, affirming, D.C., 29 F.Supp. 386.

(8) Administrator has the same property in goods of the intestate as decedent himself had, and the same remedies to recover the goods or to prevent their unlawful appropriation by others.—McNair v. Howle, 116 S. E. 279, 123 S.C. 252.

(9) Administrator and heir of mortgagor seeking to enjoin foreclosure of chattel mortgage, stands in right of mortgagor.—Gilfillan's Adm'r v. Bixby, 139 A. 250, 100 Vt. 468.

(10) Generally he has no greater rights than deceased would have if living.

Cal.—Wortley v. Wood-Callahan Oil Co., 112 P.2d 226, 17 Cal.2d 762.

Ga.—Whitworth v. Wofford, 73 Ga. 259.

Mass.—Goodhue v. State St. Trust Co., 165 N.E. 701, 267 Mass. 28.

(11) However, it is no novelty for an executor to be given rights which the testator could not have exercised when he lived.—Fox Film Corporation v. Knowles, N.Y., 43 S.Ct. 365, 261 U.S. 326, 67 L.Ed. 680, reversing, C.C.A., 279 F. 1018, affirming, D.C., 274 F. 731 and 275 F. 582.

Decedent's acts as binding on representative

(1) As representative of decedent, the executor or administrator is bound by acts of decedent.—Levy v. New York Life Ins. Co., 265 N.Y.S. 377, 238 App.Div. 711, affirmed 195 N.E. 204, 266 N.Y. 570.

(2) Hence, insured's executors are bound by acts of insured in designating beneficiaries and by his waiver of policy provision for change of beneficiary.—Levy v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra.

Representative as agent of heirs and legatees

"It is true, in a certain sense, that an administrator is the agent of the heirs and the legatees, but his agency is representative rather than personal. The appointment obtains, in some instances, irrespective of the wishes of the heirs. He is responsible to them for any act without his authority. But, acting within his authority and in accordance with law, he may legally perform acts against the express wishes of the heirs. His rights as administrator cannot be revoked without the consent of the courts. He holds in custodia legis the estate coming into his hands as administrator. Therefore, in the strict sense of the word, he is not the agent of the heirs, but is rather the agent of the probate court, whose orders, generally speaking, he must obey."—Rollins v. Shaner, 292 S.W. 419, 421, 316 Mo. 953.

Representation where conflict of interest

(1) Where there are rival claimants to corpus of testator's estate, executrix cannot represent either side.—In re Thompson's Estate, 287 P. 21, 156 Wash. 486.

(2) Administrator may not represent the personal interests of claimant at the expense of the estate to the detriment of the heirs.—Ekdahl v. Wessman, 14 A.2d 757, 127 Conn. 141, 129 A.L.R. 920.

Acts of representative as binding beneficiaries

(1) As nominated executor and propounder of will was legal party to conduct litigation involved in caveat, testator's widow was bound by his consent that judge other than trial judge should receive verdict.—Dyar v. Dyar, 128 S.E. 582, 160 Ga. 469.

(2) Administrator as adverse party to claimants in heirship proceeding see Descent and Distribution § 80 note 4.

With respect to realty

(1) Administrator does not represent heirs when title to land is involved, unless land is needed to pay debts.—Miller v. Oil City Iron Works, 45 S.W.2d 36, 184 Ark. 900.

(2) In absence of order of court, what administrator does in relation to decedent's real estate he does as agent for heirs.—In re Huff's Estate, 150 A. 98, 300 Pa. 64.

(3) Administrator acting in representative capacity in managing real estate is merely agent of heirs, who alone can call on him to account.—Wolfe v. Lewisburg Trust & Safe Deposit Co., 158 A. 567, 305 Pa. 583, 81 A.L.R. 660.

(4) Real property and interests therein as assets of estate see supra §§ 103-112.

Express trustee

An administrator or executor is an "express trustee" by virtue of his order of appointment and bond taken by the court for faithful performance of his trust.—Jackson v. Dobbs, 290 S.W. 402, 154 Tenn. 602.

Representative as public officer

(1) An executor or administrator is not a public officer in the legal meaning of the term, but is a mere trustee acting in private capacity for private persons.—Ramsay v. Van Meter, 133 N.E. 193, 300 Ill. 193.

(2) However, he is deemed an officer appointed to settle decedent's estate.—Glidden v. Rines, 128 A. 4, 124 Me. 286.

(3) As officer of court see infra § 147.

(4) Executor and administrator defined see supra § 3.

(5) Public administrators see infra §§ 1050-1053.

Purpose of trust

(1) Administrator is primarily a "trustee" of decedent for the purpose of handling his estate and paying his debts.—Stone v. Townsend, 1 So. 2d 237, 190 Miss. 547.

(2) Executor, in equity is mere trustee charged with performance of will.—In re Forrest's Estate, 249 N. Y.S. 766, 140 Misc. 14, reversed on other grounds Grossman, In re, 254 N.Y.S. 1012, 234 App.Div. 890, affirmed 182 N.E. 177, 259 N.Y. 553.

Personalty and realty distinguished

Deceased's personal representative holds personal assets in trust, first for creditors, and secondarily for distributees, but representative's position as to realty is antagonistic to heirs, because representative must protect creditors.—Fleming v. Kirkland, 146 So. 384, 226 Ala. 222.

In prosecution of claims

Administrator is primarily representative of estate, in prosecution of claims against it.—Harrison Mach. Works v. Aufderheide, 280 S.W. 711, 222 Mo.App. 474.

Duty to advise

Trust company acting as administrator of estate stood in fiduciary relationship to testator's widow and sole distributee and was under duty to advise her in all matters concerning probable financial outcome of its settlement.—Ohio Merchants' Trust Co. v. Conrad, 181 N.E. 274, 42 Ohio App. 150.

Duty of disclosure

Executor is bound to disclose material facts within his knowledge whenever beneficiary's interest is to be affected by transaction with executor, concealment by executor being fraudulent in law and furnishing basis for equitable relief.—Baker v. Baker, 142 S.W.2d 737, 24 Tenn. App. 220.

Impartial role

In seeking construction of will, executor assumes impartial role between devisees or other parties at interest.—Bearden v. Longino, 190 S.E. 12, 183 Ga. 819.

Executor as legatee

(1) Executor-trustee under will, who took residuary estate as legatee, was clothed with power to conserve the residuary estate but was under a first duty to beneficiaries of special bequests.—Woods v. Chrissinger, 173 So. 57, 233 Ala. 575.

(2) Testator's widow, who was sole residuary legatee and executrix, was obliged, as executrix, to deal fairly with other persons interested in estate and to take no advantage for herself to detriment of others.—In re Lawrence's Estate, 295 N.Y. S. 930, 162 Misc. 802.

It is fraud in law for an administrator to take for his own benefit a position in which his interest will conflict with his duty.—Scholtz v. Hazard, 191 P. 123, 68 Colo. 343.

Interests of all must be protected

Mo.—Gooldy v. Lavender, 16 S.W.2d 681, 223 Mo.App. 354.

Search for sole heir

Administrator occupied position of trust with respect to only heir and next of kin of intestate, so as to be required to put forth every reasonable effort to discover him.—Welch v. Flory, 200 N.E. 900, 294 Mass. 138, 106 A.L.R. 813.

Representative's attorney occupies same fiduciary relation to the estate and heirs as does the representative.—Bruun v. Hanson, C.C.A.Idaho, 103 F.2d 685, certiorari denied Hanson v. Bruun, 60 S.Ct. 86, 308 U.S. 571, 84 L.Ed. 479, and conformed to, D.C., Bruun v. Hanson, 30 F.Supp. 602.

Guardianship of decedent's children. The executor or administrator is not, as such, the guardian of decedent's minor children,⁴⁵ nor has he any concern with the support and education of the children.⁴⁶

§ 143. Proof and Defense of Will

For a consideration of the duty of an executor to probate the will, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 311, also 68 C.J. p 879 notes 92-96 and 23 C.J. p 1171 note 23; of the right of an executor to offer the will for probate, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 315, also 68 C.J. p 888 note 44, and 23 C.J. p 1171 note 22; of the right and duty of the executor to defend the will generally, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 324, also 68 C.J. p 908 note 23-81; and of the right and duty of the executor to defend the will in a will contest, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 331, also 68 C.J. p 935 notes 65-69 and 23 C.J. p 1171 notes 24-26. Allowances to the executor for expenditures incurred in probating the will or in a contest of the will are considered infra § 225.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 144. Burial of Decedent

An executor or administrator is under a duty to have decedent's remains buried in a suitable manner.

One of the first duties of an executor or administrator is to attend to the decent and proper interment of the remains of his decedent,⁴⁷ in a manner suitable to his estate and station in life,⁴⁸ and, as discussed infra § 230, a reasonable and judicious expenditure for this purpose will always be approved.

§ 145. Executing Provisions of Will

An executor ordinarily must execute the will in accordance with its valid terms and provisions.

An executor is charged with knowledge of the provisions of the will under which he was nominated,⁴⁹ and it is his duty faithfully to execute the will⁵⁰ in accordance with its terms and its provi-

Duties of representative and trustee distinguished

(1) Duties of "executor" or "administrator" and those of "trustee" are distinct.—Caruso v. Caruso, 143 A. 771, 103 N.J.Eq. 487, reversed on other grounds 148 A. 882, 106 N.J. Eq. 130.

(2) Functions of an "executor" and a "trustee" are in some respects technically different, but in many respects are the same, function of an executor being generally that of a trustee.—Voorhies v. Blood, 171 So. 658, 126 Fla. 710.

(3) "The general duties of an executor are to collect the effects of the deceased, pay the claims against his estate, and distribute the residue to those entitled. . . . A trustee is a person in whom some estate, interest or power, in or affecting property is vested for the benefit of another."—Los Angeles County v. Morrison, 101 P.2d 470, 471, 15 Cal. 2d 368, 129 A.L.R. 443.

(4) Powers, duties, and liabilities of executors as trustees see the C. J.S. title Trusts § 255, also 65 C.J. p 665 notes 17-26.

One person as executor and trustee

(1) When persons are named as executors by a will, and are given the management of a trust fund, they may act in the capacity both of executors and trustees at the same time, although there is a distinction between their rights and duties, as such.—Wechsler v. Drey, 197 N.Y.S. 453, 203 App.Div. 692.

(2) Relative to whether a will not recognizing with any accuracy the distinction between duties and authority of executors and trustees, and in terms giving certain authority to the trustees, who were the same persons as the executors, intended the executors to have the authority, the language is to be considered with reference to the duties to be performed, and not as if used in its technical meaning.—In re Kohler, 132 N. sions,⁵¹ although any testamentary provisions which purport to extend an executor's powers beyond those conferred by law must be disregarded.⁵²

A testator's wishes and directions, not precatory merely, as set forth in the will, must be followed, if possible, in all particulars,⁵³ unless they are contrary to law,⁵⁴ unless some appropriate tribunal properly authorizes the executor to swerve aside,⁵⁵ or unless, it is sometimes held, an agreement of all persons interested in the estate raises an estoppel.⁵⁶ The executor's duty to dispose of the estate according to the will is not affected by the fact that, as beneficiary, he claims the right to spend the principal.⁵⁷

Setting up trust and executing provisions. When directed by the will, the executor is under a duty to set up a trust fund.⁵⁸ Where trusts are raised by the will, but no trustee is appointed by the testator,

Segregation from date of testator's death

Under will directing creation of five trusts in varying pecuniary amounts, for infant beneficiaries, executors were required to segregate, from date of testator's death, the share of income in cash for benefi-

the law charges the executor with the duty of carrying out the trust until the court appoints some other trustee; and consequently the executor may retain funds in his hands for that purpose and otherwise prepare to fulfill the trust.⁵⁹

§ 146. Delegation of Powers

Ordinarily a personal representative cannot delegate his authority or duty, but he may employ or permit others to perform tasks which he cannot reasonably be expected to perform personally.

Ordinarily, an executor or administrator cannot delegate his authority or duty⁶⁰ and thus avoid any of the liabilities or escape any of the duties imposed on him by law,⁶¹ even though the person to whom such delegation is attempted is one in whom the testator placed great confidence.⁶²

The representative is not required, however, personally to perform every act which may be necessary or proper in the execution of his trust.⁶³ He may properly permit others to perform tasks which he cannot reasonably be expected personally to perform.⁶⁴ Thus, when necessary, he may employ and pay agents of his own, such as professional counsel, collectors, bookkeepers, etc., who respond to him alone for their acts, and for whose acts he as principal must answer.⁶⁵ Nevertheless, since an executor is unable to contract with himself as president of a company, he cannot as executor give a valid power of attorney to the company.⁶⁶

Ratification. An executor may ratify a contract made by his attorney or agent so as to bind himself,⁶⁷ but he cannot ratify an act which he himself had no authority to do.⁶⁸

§ 147. Supervision and Guidance of Courts

- a. In general
- b. Exercise of jurisdiction

a. In General

The courts have supervisory jurisdiction over executors and administrators.

An executor or administrator is frequently regarded as a creature or officer of the court.⁶⁹ He is subject to the direction, supervision, and control of the court⁷⁰ until the estate is closed and he is

Discretionary power

Probate courts are vested with large discretionary power to control executors and administrators in administration of estates.—In re Workman's Estate, 68 P.2d 479, 156 Or. 333, denying rehearing 65 P.2d 1395, 156 Or. 333.—In re Faulkner's Estate, 65 P.2d 1045, 156 Or. 23.

Approval or disapproval of acts

(1) Executor or administrator can act only with consent and approval of court.—In re Carpenter's Estate, 231 N.W. 376, 210 Iowa 553.

(2) Probate court is the tribunal to approve or disapprove if administrators neglect to procure authorization to perform acts.—In re Madalena's Estate, 108 P.2d 17, 42 Cal. App.2d 12.

Acts on behalf of corporation

(1) Surrogate has jurisdiction to inquire into conduct of executors as directors of domestic corporation, stock in which is estate's only property, and hold them liable for injury to estate.—In re Gerbereux' Will, 266 N.Y.S. 134, 148 Misc. 461.

(2) Where all stock in corporation was owned by decedent and passed to his fiduciaries, court has power to order fiduciaries to take corporate action to extent necessary to adjust respective rights of remaindermen and of income beneficiaries, and to compel observance of state's public policy against income accumulations, as by directing fiduciaries to pay corporate debts out of capital assets only, or to transfer sums paid to estate out of corporate income from estate's capital account to income accounts.—In re Adler's Estate, 299 N.Y.S. 542, 164 Misc. 544.

Dilatory administration

Court has power to make all necessary orders looking to final settlement of estate, if administrator is dilatory.—Hopkins v. Crews, 124 So. 202, 220 Ala. 149.

Nonresident administrator

Administrator of state, although individually nonresident, cannot claim that courts of state have no jurisdiction over him, at least as to property within state.—Faughnan v. Bashlor, 136 S.E. 545, 163 Ga. 525.

Substitution of receiver

Executors, having so conducted themselves in the execution of their trust as to necessitate a court of equity through a receiver to take the estate from their possession and control, may not assert the right to exercise any power conferred on them by the will; but equity, having properly obtained jurisdiction over all interested parties of the estate, is authorized to dispose of it as in fairness and good conscience the facts and circumstances demand, notwithstanding Rev.St. arts 3358, 3374, as to execution of directions in will and power of sale thereby given executors.—Richardson v. McCloskey, Tex. Civ.App., 261 S.W. 801, on other grounds, Com.App., 276 S.W. 680.

Report to court

An administrator must report his proceedings to court, and after court approves his act it adopts it as its own, and it becomes a judicial act.—Rodebeck v. Richardson, 144 N.E. 41, 83 Ind.App. 186.

Restraining action by representative

An action being prosecuted in another state by administratrix, appointed in Iowa, for wrongful death in Iowa of her intestate, in contravention of the public policy declared by Acts 37th Gen.Assem. c 293, may, by the district court sitting in probate, be required to be dismissed by such court's order to the administratrix, the court not being deprived of its jurisdiction thus to control the administratrix by Federal Employers' Liability Act, § 6, as amended.—In re Spoo's Estate, 183 N.W. 580, 191 Iowa 1134.

Jurisdiction in death actions see Death §§ 50, 51.

Executor in individual capacity

The surrogate's court possesses no jurisdiction over an executor in his individual capacity.—In re Sullivan's Estate, 6 N.Y.S.2d 783, 169 Misc. 16, affirmed 8 N.Y.S.2d 533, 255 App.Div. 1008.

S.C.—Hunter v. Boykin, 10 S.E.2d 152, 195 S.C. 23.

Charitable gifts

Where discretionary powers are given an executor to determine the object of charitable testamentary gifts, the powers should be exercised under the direction of the court after reference to the master, especially where the fund, after the powers have been exercised, is to pass out of the jurisdiction of the court.—Pell v. Mercer, 14 R.I. 412.

Violation of duty cannot be approved or ratified by the court.—Nonnast v. Northern Trust Co., 29 N.E.2d 251, 374 Ill. 248, modifying In re Nonnast's Estate, 21 N.E.2d 796, 300 Ill.App. 537.

Guarding interests of minor

Courts should see to it that estates which undergo administration are carefully guarded and preserved,

The supervisory power of the courts over executors and administrators is derived from the jurisdiction of courts of equity in cases of trusts arising in the settlement of estates,⁷⁶ and may be exercised by courts of probate only when it is expressly or by necessary implication conferred on them by statute.⁷⁷

b. Exercise of Jurisdiction

(1) In general

(2) Requests for instructions

(1) In General

The supervisory jurisdiction of courts over executors and administrators is exercised with restraint and according to the circumstances of the particular case.

The jurisdiction of the courts to supervise and direct executors and administrators has long been exercised,⁷⁸ and may be invoked by a creditor.⁷⁹ It is said that the extent and limits of the court's supervisory control are not clearly fixed,⁸⁰ but depend on the circumstances of the particular case.⁸¹

The court will not ordinarily usurp the representative's function of administering the estate to the best advantage of all concerned;⁸² and, except in cases of abuse,⁸³ it will not ordinarily interfere with the discretionary powers conferred on the executor by the will.⁸⁴

A court ordinarily has no power to limit the authority of the representative whose duties and powers are fixed by law;⁸⁵ nor has it power ordinarily to violate the provisions of a valid will,⁸⁶ although it may relieve an executor from his duty to carry out the provisions of the will if the best interest of the estate is served thereby.⁸⁷

What constitutes abuse

The rule that, where executors are given unlimited discretion, the court will not usually interfere is subject to many exceptions, and, although merely convincing the court that time for sale or partition is at hand, is not sufficient for complaining legatee to prevail, actual fraud on the part of the executors need not be shown, and, if executors refrain from conversion and partition bona fide, but for a reason which is not in the interests of the beneficiaries, the court may control their judgment.—Canda v. Canda, Ch., 113 A. 503, affirmed 112 A. 727, 92 N.J. Eq. 423, 13 A.L.R. 1029.

Provision in will denying review by courts

(1) Although a will directed that appraisement and distribution by the executors could not be questioned or reviewed by the courts, any party in interest may procure such review.—Nixon v. Nixon, 109 N.E. 294, 268 Ill. 524.

(2) A testamentary provision that the decision of the executors "shall be final and conclusive" on all matters in the will is insufficient to prevent a review by the court.—Reilly's Estate, 6 North.Co. 385.

N.J.—Canda v. Canda, Ch., 113 A. 503, affirmed 112 A. 727, 92 N.J. Eq. 423, 13 A.L.R. 1029.

In absence of fraud court cannot interfere with executors within discretion given by will.—In re Johnson's Estate, 266 N.Y.S. 215, 148 Misc. 738.

Undue interference

Decree requiring executor to confer with life tenant and to investigate available investments, and providing for notice and hearing for guidance of executor, unduly hampered executor's discretion.—Patterson's Ex'r v. Dean, 44 S.W.2d 565, 241 Ky. 671.

Burden of proof

Where executor is vested by will with discretion, burden is on legatee, who wishes court to interfere to prove and establish that executor has proceeded from selfish, corrupt, or improper motives.—In re DeBancourt's Estate, 272 N.W. 891, 279 Mich. 518, 110 A.L.R. 1346.

Performance of duties contrary to will

Court cannot direct executors to perform their duties in manner contrary to will, although all parties concerned are in court competent to and do consent.—Holden v. Morgan, 169 A. 546, 115 N.J. Eq. 59.

Power cautiously exercised

N.Y.—In re Casper's Estate, supra.

Mistake in will

Power of court to relieve executors of the duty of compliance with will should be invoked when it develops that error in the will, if confirmed, will result not only in the destruction of a substantial part of the testamentary provision for disposition of the estate, but in unjust enrichment of one claiming a benefaction unintended.—In re Casper's Estate, supra.

To prevent financial loss

Where the intervention and exer-

The direction of the court properly obtained will protect the representative in his acts done pursuant thereto,⁸⁸ but the court cannot confer powers which are denied by law.⁸⁹

The propriety of past conduct of the representative should not be passed on until the termination of the trust or an accounting.⁹⁰ It cannot be raised on a petition for instructions.⁹¹

As a rule the courts will not of their own motion interfere with advice and directions in the details of management of decedent's estate, but will rather review the representative's whole course of conduct, should a contest arise, on his due accounting and settlement.⁹²

An executor or administrator has the right to apply to the courts for direction and guidance in the performance of the duties of his office or trust, when he is in doubt as to the extent of his powers and duties or as to the proper manner in which to proceed,⁹³ especially, and statutes sometimes so provide, in the case of a will the provisions of which

Instructions as to distribution of estate see infra § 482.

Purpose of bill

Bills for direction and advice are maintainable only by fiduciaries such as executors, with regard to questions necessarily arising in the administration of their trusts, and are designed to furnish protection to the fiduciaries in the discharge of their duties and to facilitate the execution of trusts.—Bisson v. Gosselin, 6 A.2d 766, 90 N.H. 273.

Nature of proceeding

Proceeding to procure surrogate's advice is independent of probate proceeding, and should be subsequently brought under statute in course of administration by executor holding letters testamentary.—In re Coleman's Estate, 269 N.Y.S. 617, 150 Misc. 76.

Proceeding as equitable

Where the proceeding instituted by an administrator was in the nature of an application to the court for direction, and was an attempt specifically to enforce, as against the widow, the provisions of an alleged antenuptial contract, the proceeding was in the nature of specific performance, and relief could only be granted by a court of equity.—State v. Circuit Court of La Crosse County, 188 N.W. 645, 177 Wis. 548.

Premature request

Administrator's request for instructions as to investments and payments after death of testatrix' surviving father, to whom will directed annual payment of stated sum, was properly denied as premature.—Casey v. Genter, 176 N.E. 782, 276 Mass. 165.

Procedure

(1) An executor, desiring to obtain the instructions of the court, should bring a bill in equity, and not a petition.—Gibbons v. Shepard, 125 Mass. 541.

(2) In suit by executors for advice, considerable latitude may properly be allowed in giving scope to questions propounded, where to do so places no unfair burden on the parties and they have not been in any way misled as to the issues to be presented to the court.—First Nat. Bank & Trust Co. v. Baker, 1 A.2d 283, 124 Conn. 577, 118 A.L.R. 339.

(3) Facts relied on by either party as aid to interpretation of will must be incorporated in record to obtain consideration by court of chancery.—Equitable Trust Co. v. Pyle, Del.Ch., 2 A.2d 81.

(4) Where bill failed to allege existence of facts on which opinion of court was desired, instructions could not be rendered based upon statements of fact in brief of trustees and executors, since case does not gather its facts from the briefs.—Equitable Trust Co. v. Pyle, supra.

(5) Weight of testimony was for probate judge on executor's petition for instructions.—Ferguson v. South Dartmouth Cemetery Ass'n, 163 N.E. 877, 265 Mass. 285.

Costs

(1) Costs in such proceedings are usually in the discretion of the court.—In re Miller's Estate, 4 N.Y.S.2d 671, 167 Misc. 721.

(2) Where opposition interposed to application of temporary administrators for instructions bordered on the vexatious, the cost of the application was awarded against the opposing party.—In re Miller's Estate, supra.

(3) On report by judge of probate of questions of law presented by executors of will, allowance of costs and expenses as between solicitor and client was in probate court's discretion.—Smith v. Livermore, 10 N.E.2d 117, 298 Mass. 223.

(4) On executor's petition for instructions, there being real controversy, probate court did not abuse discretion in allowing costs to unsuccessful legatee, payable from estate.—First Nat. Bank v. Perkins Institute for the Blind, 176 N.E. 532, 275 Mass. 498.

Review

(1) The denial of a petition by an administrator for leave to expend are ambiguous or doubtful or difficult to construe,⁹⁴ provided, however, the question involved is not one which should properly be submitted in another proceeding.⁹⁵

The right to apply for advice is held to exist only so far as is necessary to guide the representative in the administration of the estate,⁹⁶ and where instructions are asked by the representative, it is not obligatory on the court to give them, but whether it will advise or direct is a matter of discretion.⁹⁷ If the representative's duty is clear, the court will not entertain a petition for instructions,⁹⁸ nor will it do so where there is no uncertainty or doubt as to the meaning of the will.⁹⁹ Instructions concerning matters calling for administrative or business judgment will not ordinarily be given,¹ unless the circumstances are unusual and peculiar, making it unsafe for the representative to proceed in the ordinary business way,² and it is sometimes said that only where unusual or peculiar circumstances exist will the court give advice concerning questions arising during the period of administration.³ The court will not take the place of counsel to act as general legal adviser to the administrator,⁴ nor will it con-funds of the estate for the erection of a monument cannot be reviewed except for an abuse of discretion.—In re Gray's Estate, 91 N.E. 745, 46 Ind.App. 24.

(2) On appeal from decree instructing executors as to will heard by supreme judicial court on a transcript of the evidence and a report of the material facts, supreme judicial court was under duty to examine the evidence and come to its own conclusions, but it would not set aside findings of trial judge unless they were shown to be plainly wrong.—Adams v. Adams, 33 N.E.2d 314, 308 Mass. 584.

(3) If appellant believed that report of material facts was not sufficiently full, he should have requested trial judge to amplify his findings.—Adams v. Adams, supra.

Executor as trustee

(1) Where three of four executors were also trustees under trust deed, suit was properly brought in equity for instructions as to fund chargeable with federal estate tax imposed on the property passing under the trust deed, as the trustees could not at law sue themselves.—Bemis v. Converse, 140 N.E. 686, 246 Mass. 131.

(2) In suit by executors, three of whom were also trustees under trust deed, for instructions as to fund chargeable with federal estate tax imposed on the trust property, they properly presented conflicting contentions made in their different capacities through different counsel, and joined as defendants the various beneficiaries, thus permitting them to set up their own contentions.—Bemis v. Converse, supra.

Change in amount of trust fund

Proceeding to put amount in trust fund to furnish legatee annuity bequeathed by will, where securities provided by testator had depreciated to an extent whereby the income therefrom was insufficient to pay annuity, was properly brought by administrator with the will annexed of testator by asking for instructions in the premises so that he might safely proceed.—In re Burton's Will, 281 N.Y.S. 579, 156 Misc. 175.

Representative not to take sides

Representative petitioning for construction of residuary clause of will has no interest other than to be duly advised and instructed and has no right to seek particular construction among conflicting positions which might be taken.—Bisson v. Gosselin, 6 A.2d 766, 90 N.H. 273.

(2) In such case, the executor's pleadings seeking direction of court should be amended before decree to show claim for restoration of property.—McConnel v. Stryker, supra.

Matter of procedure

In action by surviving wife to recover amount of bank deposit which was in name of husband or wife at

sider abstract or moot questions,⁵ and it has been said that such application for instructions ought not to be favored, except where great interests are involved and a decision in the ordinary course of litigation would be attended with great inconvenience, delay, and expense.⁶

Duty of representative to request instructions. Sometimes it is the duty of the representative to seek direction and guidance from the court,⁷ and he should apply if he is in doubt as to his duties or the policy to follow,⁸ particularly if the security of the estate is affected thereby.⁹ However, he is not always obliged to seek the assistance of the court,¹⁰ and is not usually chargeable with mismanagement for acting without an order of court, if his act caused no injury or was such as the court would have ordered done.¹¹

Instructions on application of legatee. The court will not give instructions to an executor or administrator merely on the application of a legatee or the personal representative of a legatee.¹²

§ 148. Submission to Arbitration or Reference

The representative may ordinarily agree to submit claims in favor of or against the estate to arbitration or reference.

The personal representative has, as a rule, the right to agree to submit to an arbitration¹³ or reference¹⁴ as to claims in favor of¹⁵ or against, see infra §§ 442, 443, the estate, but some of the earlier cases, although admitting this power, held that the representative became liable as for waste if the estate was eventually injured by the award.¹⁶

§ 149. Confession of Judgment

In a proper case the representative may confess judgment for a debt contracted or obligation incurred by the decedent.

While a confession of judgment by an executor or administrator has been regarded with disfavor, and has resulted in a charge against him de bonis propriis,¹⁷ there is authority for the view that in a proper case the representative may confess judgment for a debt contracted or obligation incurred by decedent with the effect of binding the estate,¹⁸

Power under will

(1) Generally.—Miller v. Ege, 8 Pa. 352.

(2) Under will authorizing executrix to sell and convey land "by warranty deed or otherwise," to discharge liens or for other purposes, executrix had power, in a proceeding instituted with her sanction and approval, in which she entered appearance for infant devisees, to agree to the entry of what amounted to a consent decree approving foreclosure sale and the execution of a commissioner's deed to purchaser at such sale.—Wirtz v. Gordon, 184 So. 798, 187 Miss. 866, reinstated, 192 So. 29, 187 Miss. 866, certiorari denied Gordon v. Wirtz, 60 S.Ct. 618, 309 U.S. 630, 84 L.Ed. 988.

(3) A request by mortgagor's executrix, as defendant in foreclosure or in the absence of statutory restriction, by confessing judgment in favor of a creditor, give him a preference over other creditors of the same class.¹⁹

Where, however, executors confess judgment for a debt of their testator, on a miscalculation of the amount of the assets in their hands, and with a full understanding of their personal liability in case of a deficiency of assets, they will not be relieved in equity against the judgment after it appears that the assets are insufficient to satisfy it.²⁰

§ 150. Estoppel

A representative of a decedent's estate in his official capacity is bound by the laws of estoppel, although his official acts ordinarily will not estop him as an individual and his individual acts usually do not estop him in his official capacity.

An executor or administrator, in his capacity as such, is as much bound by the laws of estoppel as though he were acting in his individual capacity.²¹ However, unauthorized acts of the representative cannot bind the estate or give rise to an estoppel against it;²² and except where his acts as a representative and as an individual are so closely connected and associated that it is impossible to distinguish his actions in one capacity from the other,²³ or where his acts as a representative have resulted or will result in his individual profit,²⁴ acts of an executor or administrator in his representative capacity will not bind or estop him in his individual capacity,²⁵ and conversely, except where the estoppel is based on, and can be supported by, equities against the estate,²⁶ his acts as an individual cannot operate as an estoppel against him in his representative capacity.²⁷

The laws of estoppel may also operate in favor proceeding, that the foreclosure sale be confirmed and commissioner's deed be executed, had the same legal efficacy as if executrix had been a petitioner instead of a defendant, asking for a decree sanctioning a sale authorized under the will.—Wirtz v. Gordon, supra.

§ 151. Powers before Qualification

- a. In general
- b. Relation back of letters

a. In General

The representative ordinarily cannot exercise his powers freely until he has qualified, although he is usually permitted to take such steps as are necessary to prevent dissipation of the estate.

Although the executor has been, and in some jurisdictions still is, somewhat favored in this respect,²⁹ in many jurisdictions, sometimes by reason of statute, neither executor nor administrator is entitled to exercise power freely as such until he has been duly qualified by giving bond or otherwise, as local statute may direct.³⁰ However, notwithstanding the representative's want of authority to receive assets before appointment, his taking possession of the estate and dealing therewith for purposes of immediate protection, custody, and management is somewhat favored in practice, and to some extent has sometimes been authorized by statute,³¹ and for whatever assets he thus receives he is chargeable in his representative capacity when his appointment becomes completed.³²

For acts which the representative could not properly do after qualifying he may be held personally liable for performing before qualifying.³³ One who undertakes to discharge and settle accounts of the estate before he is appointed and duly qualified as executor or administrator does so without legal authority and at his peril, and will after his appointment be held responsible for his acts.³⁴

One who, before he was appointed executor of an estate, promised for the purposes of an amicable settlement of all questions as to the probate and validity of a certain will that he would, when appointed as executor, make certain payments to the heirs and distributees was bound individually by the agreement when, as a result of the contract, he became executor.³⁵

tate before probate,³⁶ as a general rule neither an executor nor an administrator can sue or be sued, either at law or in equity, until he has been duly qualified.³⁷ However, it is held in some cases that an executor may commence an action and proceed with it to the point where proof of letters testamentary is necessary,³⁸ and in some jurisdictions it is even held more generally that one nominated by will to be executor may before probate and grant of letters, maintain a bill in chancery to protect the estate from dissipation.³⁹

Where the cause of action is founded on actual possession of the executor and accrued to him rather than the testator, the executor may sue thereon prior to probate of the will.⁴⁰ It has also been held that in a proceeding to revive a judgment plaintiff is entitled to a writ of scire facias against the persons named as executors in the will of the judgment debtor, although no letters have been issued to them.⁴¹

b. Relation Back of Letters

On issuance of letters, they relate back to the date of the decedent's death and validate proper or necessary acts of the representative done in the interim.

When letters testamentary or of administration are issued they relate back to the time of decedent's death⁴² and validate the acts of the representative done in the interim⁴³ which are otherwise lawful and proper⁴⁴ or necessary to the proper administration of the estate,⁴⁵ the doctrine being controlled to some extent by the equities in the case.⁴⁶ However, such validation or ratification applies only to acts which might properly have been done by a personal representative and the estate ought not to be bound or prejudiced by wrongful or injurious acts performed before one's appointment.⁴⁷

§ 152. Powers pending Appeal from Appointment or Probate

The powers of an executor or administrator ordinarily are suspended during the pendency of an appeal from an order admitting the will to probate or appointing an administrator or during the pendency of an action to test the validity of the will.

An appeal from an order admitting a will to probate or appointing an administrator, or the pendency of a will contest or an action to set aside a will, suspends the powers of the representative for the time being,⁴⁹ unless under statutory provisions the general appointee is kept in office on a pendente lite footing,⁵⁰ but it does not wholly vacate the appointment, and if the appeal is discontinued, or the contest finally terminated by a decision sustaining the letters issued, the representative is restored to full powers, which relate back as though there had been no contest.⁵¹ Acts of the representative during the pendency of the appeal which would otherwise be lawful may bind the estate as to persons not having notice of the appeal.⁵²

It has been held that in case of a contest as to the validity of a will the representative is not relieved from his duties except as far as rights under the will are concerned,⁵³ although if letters have not been issued to the executor, or if they have been suspended by the appointment of an administrator pendente lite, the executor has no authority to represent the estate.⁵⁴ If the will is set aside, acts done by the nominated executor in good faith prior to the contest are valid and binding.⁵⁵

VI. DISCOVERY OF ASSETS

§ 153. Nature and Form of Remedy

In addition to discovery in equity or under statutory provisions governing discovery generally, many jurisdictions provide for a summary proceeding for the discovery of assets of a decedent's estate. Such a proceeding is generally deemed to be not strictly one at law or in equity, but a special proceeding.

It is well settled that, where an executor or administrator is embarrassed in the performance of his duty with regard to the collection of the assets of the estate by reason of his lack of knowledge of their existence or whereabouts, he may maintain a bill for a discovery against any person who, he has reason to believe, has in his possession or under his control any assets belonging to the estate,⁵⁶ provided the grounds for proceeding in equity are present;⁵⁷ and this jurisdiction of equity has been held to be not superseded by statutes providing a remedy in the court of probate jurisdiction for the same purpose.⁵⁸

At common law, if an administrator claimed a portion of the property alleged by creditors to belong to the estate, and if the claim was adverse to that of the creditors, they might resort to equity.⁵⁹

Statutory proceedings. In proper cases the representative of an estate seeking to discover assets thereof may resort to statutory proceedings for discovery generally,⁶⁰ which are treated in Discovery § 20 et seq.

As appears infra § 159, in many jurisdictions, in order to aid the collection of assets, executors and administrators are authorized by statute to maintain summary proceedings in the probate court to obtain a disclosure by persons supposed to have in their possession or to have concealed property of decedent or to have embezzled funds belonging to him. The procedure must be in compliance with the statute.⁶¹ Generally proceedings of this kind are to be deemed special proceedings.⁶² Discovery proceedings in which title to property may be tried and determined have been said to be neither at law nor in equity;⁶³ they bear the equitable aspects of a bill of discovery,⁶⁴ while in so far as they provide for a trial for the determination of property rights they are actions at law.⁶⁵ However, it has also been said, without reference to the dual nature of the proceeding, that it constitutes an action at law,⁶⁶ and is in no sense equitable in nature.⁶⁷

Where summary proceedings for discovery were available, it was held that an administrator could not obtain discovery of assets in his action to cancel intestate's deed.⁶⁸

The proceeding under a statute providing for the entry of a judgment for the value of effects found to have been embezzled, concealed, or conveyed away by defendant, plus a penalty, is deemed quasi-criminal.⁶⁹

§ 154. Right to Institute Proceedings

The persons by and against whom discovery proceedings may be brought are determined by the governing statutes. The proceedings should be justified by reasonable grounds for inquiry; and they will not lie where the facts sought to be discovered, or the property itself, is in petitioner's possession.

The right to institute summary discovery proceedings is generally extended to certain classes of persons and fiduciaries, such as executors, administrators, and guardians.⁷⁰ Under some statutes any per-

Failure of coexecutor to join

An executor had the power to initiate a discovery proceeding against one who in his opinion had property of the estate and refused to deliver it, although a coexecutor did not join in the petition.—In re Rutherford's Estate, 293 N.Y.S. 515, 161 Misc. 622.

A trustee which was formerly an executor of the estate cannot institute proceedings against its cotrustee.

son interested in the estate may maintain such proceedings,⁷¹ and it has been held that a creditor may do so⁷² and that the court may proceed on its own information.⁷³ The consent of neither the court nor creditors is necessary to authorize an executor to apply for a mandamus to compel a corporation, in which decedent owned stock, and its president, to permit him to examine its books to ascertain the value of the stock.⁷⁴

The existence of reasonable grounds for inquiry justifies such proceedings.⁷⁵ Under at least one statute, in order to invoke the proceeding there must be some reasonable predicate for the belief that respondent has concealed or wrongfully taken or disposed of the property;⁷⁶ under another statute it is sufficient if it reasonably appears that he may possess some knowledge concerning the property, and it is not necessary that he be or have been in possession thereof.⁷⁷

Since, as appears infra § 159, it is a fundamental purpose of these statutes to provide for discovery as an aid to the recovery of possession of the property of the estate, it has been held that the remedy does not reach a case where the representative has gained dominion and the only question is whether he has exercised his dominion rightfully;⁷⁸ neither will the proceedings lie where the petitioner is in possession of the facts sought to be discovered.⁷⁹ Where the administrator would, on acquiring possession of the property, hold it solely for respondent's benefit, the proceedings are not favored.⁸⁰ An estate cannot be estopped from bringing discovery proceedings by the fact that the representative participated in the unlawful transaction by which the property is wrongfully withheld;⁸¹ nor can it be estopped by such a claim where there is no showing of knowledge on the part of the representative of respondent's wrongful intentions.⁸² The fact that the administrator could maintain a plenary action of replevin is no bar to a summary proceeding in the probate court for discovery and for an order requiring the delivery of personal property of the estate or its proceeds or value.⁸³

§ 155. Proceedings against Executor or Administrator

Summary proceedings for discovery may sometimes be invoked against a personal representative. In a proper case a discovery proceeding may be continued against the representative of a respondent who dies during its pendency.

The summary process for discovery given by local codes may sometimes be invoked, as under the specific provisions of statutes, against the personal representative himself, if he be suspected of embezzlement, conversion, or withholding;⁸⁵ and a bill for discovery in equity may be brought against a representative of an estate in a proper case.⁸⁶

Of respondent. Under a statute providing both for discovery and for a determination of title, on the arising of such issue an action may be revived and continued against the personal representative of a respondent who dies after petitioner's prima facie case is completed;⁸⁷ but if it has not reached that stage, and the proceeding is still one for discovery only, the fact that respondent may have possessed pertinent information does not subject his executor to the proceedings, there being no inference that he is similarly informed.⁸⁸

§ 156. Time for Proceedings

Where summary discovery proceedings are not deemed equitable, the doctrine of laches ordinarily has no application.

§ 157. Jurisdiction and Venue

The extent of a probate court's jurisdiction in discovery proceedings is regulated by statute; jurisdiction once acquired is retained until the proceeding has been finally disposed of or discontinued.

The extent of a probate court's jurisdiction in discovery proceedings is governed by statute,⁹¹ and, in so far as it affects the scope of the inquiry and the relief that may be granted, is considered infra §§ 158, 159. A probate court once acquiring jurisdiction retains it until the proceeding has been finally disposed of or regularly discontinued.⁹² For purposes of determining whether the probate court has jurisdiction of a discovery proceeding, the petitioner's application must be accepted as true.⁹³ Where the probate court lacks jurisdiction to determine purely equitable issues as to certain property, the fact that a suit is brought in another court to determine such issues does not divest the probate court of its jurisdiction to determine title to other property involved in discovery proceedings.⁹⁴

Where a creditors' bill shows that the estate is solvent and the assets superabundant, the mere pretext of the need of discovery will not give equitable jurisdiction against a personal representative who is not shown to have neglected any of the statutory requirements relating to his duties as such representative, to the injury of plaintiff.⁹⁵

Jurisdiction of the person is acquired by proper service of citation or by respondent's voluntary appearance.⁹⁶ Proceedings may commonly be brought against one within the same general jurisdiction, although a resident of a different county,⁹⁷ and an application to compel a foreign temporary administrator of a resident decedent to disclose information necessary to enable the domestic administrator to prepare his inventory has been granted.⁹⁸

§ 158. Property or Claims as to Which Proceeding Proper

In some jurisdictions, the discovery proceeding is applicable not only where recovery of specific property in the hands of respondent is sought, but also as a means of recovering the proceeds or value of such property as has been disposed of; but respondent's obligation must have arisen from a wrongful possession of property owned by decedent or his estate, and the remedy is not available as a means of collecting a debt or enforcing a claim purely in personam, nor does it ordinarily relate to realty.

As appears in § 159 infra, the probate court has the power, in a number of jurisdictions, to order the restitution of property wrongfully taken or withheld from the estate and, in some instances, to determine who has title to the property. In some of these jurisdictions, particularly Illinois, Missouri, and New York, the remedy was formerly limited to cases looking toward the recovery of money or specific personal property capable of delivery and amenable to an order that it be delivered,⁹⁹ so that where the money had been spent, or mixed with other moneys,¹ or the property disposed of,² the proceeding would not lie and the court was without jurisdiction to entertain it. By virtue of statutory amendments, however, not only is the proceeding now available with respect to specific money or property, but, if such property has been diverted or disposed of, the court may direct payment of the proceeds or value thereof,³ and, at least in New York, may even impress a trust on the proceeds, or make any determination which a court of equity might decree in following trust funds or property.⁴ The basis of the proceeding is still specific property, but the test of whether it will lie is not whether the person charged still has possession, but whether his obligation arises from a possession without right or title; if the genesis of the obligation is predicated on such possession, the proceeding will lie, but if it is based merely on a general claim against respondent, purely in personam, it will not.⁵ Thus,

Every claim to estate's property embraced

In view of this extension of the power of the surrogate's court in discovery proceedings, and the extension of its equitable powers generally, it is frequently said that the court now has jurisdiction to determine and dispose of every claim to property which should be delivered to the representative.—In re Wilson's Estate, 169 N.E. 122, 252 N.Y. 155, affirming 232 N.Y.S. 919, 225 App.Div. 761, which affirmed Wilson's Estate, In re, 250 N.Y.S. 553, 140 Misc. 10—In re Akin's Estate, 161 N.E. 471, 248 N.Y. 202, affirming 224 N.Y.S. 743, 222 App.Div. 710, which affirmed 223 N.Y.S. 812, 129 Misc. 840—In re Thomas' Estate, 257 N.Y.S. 836, 235 App.Div. 455—In re Grossman's Estate, 251 N.Y.S. 670, 233 App.Div. 887, reversing 236 N.Y.S. 630, 134 Misc. 724—In re Rubin's Estate, 5 N.Y.S.2d 129, 168 Misc. 81—In re Accles' Estate, 275 N.Y.S. 430, 153 Misc. 421, affirmed 281 N. Other interests not involved

Where only the alleged wrongdoer and the alleged sufferer by his wrong are before the court, the jurisdiction of the surrogate's court exercised for the protection of a person defrauded by the misappropriation of property belonging to an estate of a decedent is broad, and relief will be molded and adapted to the circumstances of the case, so as to protect the interests and rights of the true owner.—In re Rubin's Estate, 5 N.Y.S.2d 129, 168 Misc. 81.

Tracing trust-impressed property

The wife of a deceased attorney who allegedly commingled, with his own securities and money the securities and proceeds from securities held by him in trust for decedent, would stand in no better position, as transferee of the trust-impressed securities who gave no consideration therefor, than the attorney who commingled the securities; recovery of the proceeds of the securities could be had on a constructive rather than an actual tracing of the securities, by a showing of continuity of relationship between the funds which the attorney received net out of the property of the decedent and the securities which in part reached the attorney's wife.—In re Rubin's Estate, supra.

Issues determinable

(1) Surrogate's court has jurisdiction to determine in discovery proceeding ownership of savings bank book claimed by administrator and by respondent under decedent's agreement to leave her property, with certain exceptions, to respondent.—In re Razoux' Estate, 276 N. Y.S. 782, 154 Misc. 128, affirmed 277 N.Y.S. 457, 154 Misc. 477.

(2) Surrogate's court had jurisdiction in proceeding for discovery of estate's assets, although proceeding involved issue of making of contract concerning mutual wills.—In re Rosenblath's Estate, 257 N.Y.S. 856, 143 Misc. 640.

Constructive trust

Alleged loan by administratrix to third person of moneys belonging to estate, amounting to devastavit, held to constitute third person constructive trustee liable to account for diversion in discovery proceedings.—In re Gauthier's Estate, 257 N.Y.S. 532, 143 Misc. 788.

Using money to pay decedent's debt

That deceased was indebted to third person was not justification for payment to such third person by attorney of funds received by him for deceased prior to her death, as third person should have filed claim with executors; hence proceedings against attorney were proper.—In re Rutherford's Estate, 293 N.Y.S. 515, 161 Misc. 622.

Proceeding against insurance policy beneficiary

Discovery proceeding cannot be maintained against beneficiary in

in these as in other jurisdictions where the discovery proceeding is narrower in scope, it is uniformly held that it is not applicable as a mode of collecting a debt⁶ or enforcing a liability for converting property of the estate⁷ or a contractual obligation;⁸ it cannot be used as a substitute for an examination before trial⁹ or for the purpose of discovering evidence which could be used only in another action or proceeding;¹⁰ however, in this connection should be noted the statements in § 159 infra, regarding the restriction of the proceeding, in some jurisdictions, to inquiry as to assets. Of course, where it appears that respondent has title to, or rightful possession of, the property, no relief is warranted;¹¹ nor will policy on deceased's life to recover proceeds thereof although there was arrangement that beneficiary would use proceeds in some specified way, as this would merely give rise to right in personam against her.—In re Sichel's Estate, 293 N.Y.S. 559, 162 Misc. 2.

Money distributed to persons interested

Where respondent no longer has possession of money withdrawn from decedent's savings bank account, he having distributed it to petitioner and others interested in the estate, no decree directing its delivery, or other relief, can be made.—In re Degenerhardt's Estate, 206 N.Y.S. 220, 123 Misc. 762.

Property bought from decedent

Where respondent repurchased property which he had previously sold to decedent, and subsequently sold it, the proceeds of such sale could not be recovered in discovery proceedings although respondent had not paid decedent the purchase price.—In re Bawer's Estate, 230 N.Y.S. 567, 132 Misc. 568, affirmed 235 N.Y.S. 772, 226 App.Div. 866.

Attempted enforcement by respondent

Where respondent attempts to resist recovery of property of decedent through discovery proceedings by asserting the existence of a contract with decedent, the sufficiency of evidence to establish such an agreement cannot be determined by the surrogate in the discovery proceedings.—In re Penos' Estate, 221 N.Y.S. 205, 128 Misc. 718.

Witnesses to earlier wills

Inquiry proceedings in surrogate's court could not be used by executor to discover names of witnesses to wills of an earlier date than the will probated, for use in supreme court in action based on alleged agreement between plaintiff and testatrix to make a will in favor of plaintiff.—In re Rhodde's Estate, 10 N.Y.S.2d 828, 170 Misc. 596.

Gift

(1) In discovery proceeding, administratrix was not entitled to recover from respondent shares of stock which he acquired from a third person who had previously acquired stock by valid gift from deceased.—In re Wrone's Estate, 31 N.Y.S.2d 193, 177 Misc. 541.

(2) Delivery of bond and mortgage to agent of mortgagor effectuated intent to make gift of debt to mortgagor, and property could not be recovered in discovery proceedings from agent holding same as trustee for donee.—In re Ehlers' Estate, 231 N.Y.S. 16, 132 Misc. 910.

Existence of trust

In proceeding to discover assets, probate court was without jurisdiction to determine whether a bond which testatrix gave to respondent was given in trust for third person.—State ex rel. North St. Louis Trust Co. v. Wolfe, 122 S.W.2d 909, 343 Mo. 580.

any relief be granted where the property in question was taken by someone other than respondent.¹²

Under former provisions in some states the property must have belonged to decedent in his lifetime.¹³ Under more recent provisions, however, there is no such limitation, and, while the proceedings thereunder will certainly lie if deceased had ownership during his lifetime,¹⁴ it is sufficient¹⁵ and, of course, necessary¹⁶ that the estate be enti-

Acquisition by fraud

(1) An executor could not, by discovery process, reach fund which testator knowingly transferred to legatee shortly before his death, on ground that legatee had fraudulently induced testator to make transfer, where there was no proof of fraud in transfer of title, since sole issue in discovery proceeding is one of title.—In re Landau's Estate, 298 N. Y.S. 150, 163 Misc. 894.

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that the surrogate's court had jurisdiction of executor's proceeding for discovery of property which deceased had turned over to respondent to invest, although settlement had been made between respondent and deceased before her death, where settlement was allegedly procured by fraud and undue influence.—In re Lusher's Estate, 287 N.Y.S. 1000, 159 Misc. 387.

Transfer in fraud of creditors

Where it is shown or conceded that a note was voluntarily assigned by decedent, and the sole controversy is whether deceased's assignment was in fraud of creditors, court held without jurisdiction, since proceeding to attack conveyance as fraudulent can be brought only by creditors.—In re Knott's Estate, Mo.App., 65 S.W.2d 1069.

12. N.Y.—In re Brogan's Estate, 300 N.Y.S. 447, 165 Misc. 111.

Wholly owned corporation

Where petition in executor's discovery proceedings alleged that respondent corporation was wholly owned and controlled by respondent individual, but there was no attempt to pierce veil of corporate entity, and petition alleged that not only corporation, but also individual, paid moneys to executor's agent in violation of penal law, individual and corporation were to be deemed to have had and received moneys belonging to executor, and discovery order was proper with respect to individual and corporation.—In re Browning's Estate, 30 N.Y.S.2d 606, 262 App.Div. 489, affirming 30 N.Y.S. 2d 604, 263 App.Div. 718.

Property bought with proceeds of decedent's property

Under the former statute, the court has no jurisdiction to determine the title or the right to the possession of property not owned by deceased in his lifetime, but purchased with the proceeds of the sale of property so owned.—In re Hyams' Estate, 142 N.E. 589, 237 N.Y. 211, modifying 198 N.Y.S. 922, 205 App. Div. 893, 199 N.Y.S. 928, 206 App.Div. 670.

Collections made for estate

Collections made by an attorney under employment of the administrator could not be recovered by discovery proceedings, since the money had not belonged to deceased in his lifetime.—Dinsmoor v. Bressler, 45 N.E. 1086, 164 Ill. 211.

14. Ill.—Johnson v. Nelson, 173 N.E. 77, 341 Ill. 119, 88 A.L.R. 849, reversing In re Nelson's Estate, 254 Ill.App. 484—In re Swartz's Estate, 218 Ill.App. 449.

Bribe

One who bribed employee of decedent and of decedent's estate to procure contracts for work and materials had no legal right to receive or retain so much of the payment to him under the contract as equalled amount of the bribe, and it must be assumed that the contract price was loaded by the amount of the bribe, which constituted money belonging to decedent's estate, so that the executor could recover such amount from the briber.—In re Browning's Estate, 27 N.Y.S.2d 318, 176 Misc. 308.

Proceeds of lawsuit

Surrogate's court held to have jurisdiction of discovery proceedings by personal representative of estate of deceased against attorney of deceased, relative to proceeds of action for personal injuries to deceased, which had been collected by attorney, since money reached attorney's possession as money of a client held in trust.—In re Ostrow's Estate, 295 N.Y.S. 610, 162 Misc. 783.

Graft

Where executor's petition for discovery alleged that corporation corrupted an agent of the estate, procured funds of the estate in ostensible payment for coal delivered to property of the estate, and paid graft to agent in consideration of his approval of sales and graft intended to influence his actions with relation to sales and deliveries, graft remained the money of the estate when in the hands of corporation and its president, and could be recovered in discovery proceedings.—In re Browning's Estate, 30 N.Y.S.2d 604, 177 Misc. 328, affirmed 30 N.Y.S.2d 606, 262 App.Div. 489, appeal denied 31 N.Y.S.2d 1019, 263 App.Div. 718.

Property parted with by representative

Formerly, at a time when the statute applied only to property "belonging to any deceased person," it was held that the scope of the statute was to enable the personal representative of deceased to obtain possession of the property belonging to deceased at the time of his death, and that if at any time after the personal representative obtains possession he loses or parts with the possession he must bring his appropriate action at law to regain it.—Mohlke v. People, 117 Ill.App. 595.

Property alleged to belong to representative

The surrogate's court had no jurisdiction of a proceeding for discovery in which an adjudication was sought that certain shares of stock were the property of decedent's executor and that issuance of a certificate be directed.—In re Schmitt's Will, 22 N.Y.S.2d 958.

Money stolen by decedent

Administrator could not by discovery proceeding recover money allegedly stolen by decedent from his employer and deposited in various bank accounts in name of decedent and his wife, since such moneys were not claimed to be property of estate but of decedent's employer, whose rights lay in supreme court as credi-tled to the property sought to be recovered, or to its proceeds or value.

Types of property generally. Summary proceedings are available for the discovery, and, where the court has such jurisdiction, for the recovery, of personal property generally,¹⁷ including such things as books, papers, and documents,¹⁸ legal instruments¹⁹ such as bonds and mortgages,²⁰ securities,²¹ and property or money placed on deposit in the hands of a third person.²² The proceeding does not ordinarily relate to real estate²³ or to equitable interests or estates.²⁴ The surplus proceeds on a foreclosure sale under a deed of trust can be recovered from the trustee regardless of any indebtedness of the executor personally to the trustee.²⁵

Property held by discharged executors as trustees

Bonds purchased by bank and another with assets turned over to themselves as trustees after settling of their accounts as executors were not "additional securities" acquired by executors, but purchase constituted "reinvestment of trust funds" by trustees, as respects surrogate's court's jurisdiction of discovery proceeding by bank.—In re Sheldon's Estate, 9 N.Y.S.2d 307, 169 Misc. 901.

Burial plot

Proceeding by administratrix for an order to discover personality belonging to decedent and directing its delivery to administratrix was required to be dismissed in so far as it related to a burial plot of decedent, in view of fact that administratrix, as such, possessed no rights therein.—In re Rosen, 17 N.Y.S.2d 794, 173 Misc. 433.

Property of corporation wholly owned by deceased

An executor seeking to discover money and property withheld from estate was not entitled to discovery of relations between defendants and a corporation, all of whose stock was owned by testator, since surrogate's court is not the proper forum in which to bring proceedings to force an accounting by defendants of their relations with such corporation.—In re Browning's Will, 17 N.Y.S.2d 557, 258 App.Div. 621, appeal denied In re Browning's Estate, 18 N.Y.S.2d 1003, 259 App.Div. 704, and appeal dismissed 27 N.E.2d 210, 282 N.Y. 804.

compel payment thereof if it has.³¹ Insurance moneys received by a respondent for account of an estate are recoverable,³² but the court cannot compel a beneficiary legally entitled to the proceeds of a policy to deliver such proceeds to the estate.³³

§ 159. Scope of Inquiry and Relief

Some discovery statutes provide only for discovery of property belonging to the estate; others provide also for compelling restitution to the estate of any such property found to be in respondent's possession; and some even provide, in addition, for a trial of title where an issue of title is raised and for a decree in accordance with the result thereof. In the absence of statutory authorization, a court cannot, in discovery proceedings, compel restitution or grant recovery of property, or try and determine a genuine issue as to the title thereto, or the right of possession thereof.

The various types of statutes providing for summary discovery proceedings in the administration of decedents' estates have in common the fact that they are intended to, and do, furnish an expedient, summary method of discovering, as an aid to its recovery, personal property of deceased which is or has been concealed, embezzled, converted, transferred, or otherwise withheld.³⁴ Some statutes are designed to enable the representatives of an estate to discover property wrongfully taken or withheld from the estate only as preliminary to a proper action for its recovery,³⁵ and the court is given no power or jurisdiction beyond compelling an examination for the purpose of discovery.³⁶ Under other statutes the court is authorized to go beyond the mere discovery of property of the estate and may compel restitution, or grant recovery, of any such property found to be in respondent's possession,³⁷

broad as this, it really consists of two parts, namely, the discovery, or purely inquisitorial, part, and the trial of title part, which has been likened to replevin;⁴² but, despite this dual nature of the remedy, the proceeding has been said still to be fundamentally inquisitorial,⁴³ its aim being a discovery which will bring decedent's assets within the executor's dominion.⁴⁴ Ordinarily, a discovery proceeding under such a statute will embrace both the inquisition and the trial of title,⁴⁵ and the replevin phase of the proceeding must await the demonstration, on the inquisition, of respondent's possession or dealing with the property;⁴⁶ but this dual aspect is not invariable, and there may be an inquisition without a trial, as where the inquisition produces no facts warranting a trial, or where no answer asserting title is interposed,⁴⁷ and there may be a trial of title without a prior inquisition,⁴⁸ as where respondent admits possession and asserts a claim of title.⁴⁹

In the absence of statutory authorization, the probate court cannot, in discovery proceedings, try and determine a genuine issue as to the title to, or right to possession of, property.⁵⁰ Under a statute pro-

Necessity of real issue of title

It is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction to submit discovery proceeding to jury that question of title may arise in courts, but it must be shown to be present, and representative of estate must point to specific property and allege title thereto.—In re Lowe's Estate, 265 N.Y.S. 420, 148 Misc. 107.

Conflicting claims of other persons

The jurisdiction of the surrogate's court to try title is limited to a determination of title as between the personal representative and the withholding party; it has no jurisdiction to determine a controversy between a withholder of the property sought and a third person, even if the personal representative also lays claim to the same property.—In re Brennan's Estate, 221 N.Y.S. 462, 129 Misc. 283—In re Miller's Estate, 183 N.Y.S. 536, 112 Misc. 287—Matter of Silverman, 151 N.Y.S. 382, 87 Misc. 571.

Going back of title

If it appears that respondent received title from decedent, the court will not try any issue that may be raised as to whether the transfer had been fraudulently induced, the sole issue being one of title.—In re Landau's Estate, 298 N.Y.S. 150, 163 Misc. 891.

Order to execute instruments

Surrogate's court in discovery proceeding by administratrix to recover should, on determining that respondent held record title to land in question in trust for decedent, direct respondent to execute assignment of lease and conveyance to decedent's representative.—In re Poth's Will, 279 N.Y.S. 95, 153 Misc. 116, affirmed 283 N.Y.S. 428, 246 App.Div. 522.

viding for the determination by the court as to whether or not defendant had concealed or embezzled property and for the entry of a judgment against him if he had, the court, on finding defendant not guilty of embezzlement or concealment, has no authority to determine any other issues,⁵¹ such as whether a claimed gift inter vivos was or was not valid.⁵² Even if it is found, in a proceeding under such a statute, that defendant had concealed or embezzled money, the representative cannot recover the specific money, the only judgment provided for being a money judgment.⁵³

Under a statute like that formerly obtaining in New York, under which the court lacked power to try title, the interposition of an answer asserting title put an end to the proceeding,⁵⁴ but under a later New York statute and similar statutes in other jurisdictions, despite the court's lack of power to try title, the mere fact that the person sought to be examined claims ownership of the property involved does not preclude an examination of such person,⁵⁵ and the court may proceed therewith until it finds that there is a substantial basis for such claim and that a genuine issue exists.⁵⁶ If the court cannot try title, the mere fact that respondent files an answer claiming ownership does not invest the court with jurisdiction to do so.⁵⁷

§ 160. Parties, and Process or Notice

In a summary proceeding for discovery, the only necessary parties are those who have knowledge or information as to the property. A citation or summons is the usual process in such proceedings.

In a summary proceeding for discovery of assets of a decedent's estate, it has been held that the only necessary parties are those who have knowledge or information as to property that should be inventoried by, or delivered to, the representative.⁵⁸ Where the proceeding is brought by someone other than the executor, the latter is not a necessary party.⁵⁹ In an administrator's proceeding to recover possession of property from one who is executor of another estate which claims an interest in the property, such other estate is a necessary party.⁶⁰ The beneficiary of a tentative trust created by a savings bank deposit cannot be deprived of his rights therein through discovery proceedings by the executrix to which the beneficiary was not a party.⁶¹ A bill filed against an executrix to discover assets not included in the inventory is not demurrable or subject to dismissal because the executrix was made a party in her individual capacity.⁶² In a bill of discovery by one administrator against another, distributees of their decedents are ordinarily not necessary parties.⁶³ A legatee cannot, except under special circumstances, join, in a suit against the personal representative for discovery and relief, an alleged debtor of the estate from whom the representative has allegedly failed to collect assets of the estate.⁶⁴

Intervention. Where the probate court sends an issue to a court of law for trial by jury, the latter court has been held to be without power to permit intervention of another party.⁶⁵

Substitution. In a jurisdiction in which the proceeding is only inquisitorial in nature until it appears that respondent is in possession of assets, after which it becomes one in the nature of replevin, see supra § 159, where respondent dies while the proceedings are still in the first or inquisitorial stage, his personal representative cannot be substituted for him so as to require him to make discovery of facts alleged to be within the original respondent's knowledge;⁶⁶ but the rule is otherwise where the death occurs after the inquisitorial stage has shown prima facie possession of assets and the proceedings have entered the replevin stage.⁶⁷

Process or notice. Where the probate code makes no provision as to the mode of notice in discovery proceedings, a general statute requiring notice to be given by citation unless otherwise provided applies.⁶⁸ Proper citation or summons should issue and all subsequent proceedings must await its return,⁶⁹ but irregularities are waived by a general appearance and the filing of an answer to the merits.⁷⁰ The issuance of a subpoena duces tecum returnable at the same time as the order in discovery has been held proper.⁷¹

§ 161. Pleading

To obtain discovery or other relief in summary proceedings, an application must be filed setting forth the essential facts. An answer may be filed, the sufficiency and effect of which depends on the local statutes; and the filing of a reply or a bill of particulars may be directed. In at least one state the pleadings consist of interrogatories and the answers thereto.

Application; objections. In order to obtain discovery for a decedent's estate by summary proceedings an application must be filed.⁷² The motion⁷³ or petition⁷⁴ must set forth facts showing that property of the estate came into the possession of re-

Creditors are not necessary or proper parties.—In re Accles' Estate, 275 N.Y.S. 430, 153 Misc. 421, affirmed 281 N.Y.S. 973, 245 App.Div. 743.

Form of petition

Wis.—Saddington v. Hewitt, 35 N.W. 552, 70 Wis. 240.

Petition held sufficient

(1) Petition alleging that stock "formerly belonging to" decedent should be delivered to temporary administrator or included in inventory or appraisal, and that stock was loaned by decedent to respondent for temporary use as collateral for personal loans and was never returned, although demand was made, sufficiently alleged decedent's ownership of stock.—In re Chapin's Estate, 3 N.Y.S.2d 936, 167 Misc. 351.

(2) Petition alleging that petitioner believes himself entitled to the funds either individually or as administrator is sufficient, since such an allegation comprises the allegation that the funds may belong to the administrator as such.—In re Smith's Estate, 5 N.Y.S.2d 886.

Petition held insufficient

Petition seeking to discover decedent's funds and certain personality alleged to be in widow's possession or control held insufficient as to spondent, or, where the statute so requires, that respondent has in his possession or knowledge deeds or other writings evidencing title to the property in question.⁷⁵ However, at least where the statute so provides, an affidavit on information and belief is sufficient,⁷⁶ and such allegations are liberally regarded.⁷⁷ For the purpose of passing on the sufficiency of the application, the facts alleged in the petition must be taken as true.⁷⁸

Where a bill for discovery is brought under general statutes or rules, general rules as to the sufficiency of the pleadings are applicable.⁷⁹

After the filing of the application, the person cited should be given a reasonable time in which to file objections.⁸⁰

Objections to the affidavit should be urged by defendant before submitting himself to a trial, since otherwise he is assumed to waive all defects;⁸¹ and it has been held that where respondent has interposed an answer, after the overruling of a motion to quash the petition, he must be deemed to have waived any question as to the sufficiency of the affidavit to the petition.⁸²

The affidavit may be amended where petitioner finds himself misinformed, and any order subsequently made can refer only to the amended affidavit.⁸³

Answer generally. In a summary proceeding for discovery, an answer may be filed;⁸⁴ if the answer denies knowledge or possession of the property, respondent is subject to examination.⁸⁵ The interposition of an answer which alleges that respondent has title to, or right to possession of, the property, and which is sufficient to raise such issue, transforms the proceeding from a mere inquiry to a trial of title,⁸⁶ and the proceeding does not otherwise be-funds for failure to point out particular money in widow's possession owned by decedent.—In re Lowe's Estate, 265 N.Y.S. 420, 148 Misc. 107.

Concealment

Under a statute requiring allegation of concealment, a petition is insufficient which, while charging concealment, shows by other allegations that there is no concealment.—Hopper v. Hopkins, 160 A. 166, 162 Md. 448.

Criminality

The fact that a statute provides for a penalty where respondent is found guilty does not, in some cases, require an allegation of criminality in a petition stating a cause of action under another statute which does not provide for a penalty.—Losee v. Krieger, 153 N.E. 857, 22 Ohio App. 395.

Pleadings held sufficient

Pleadings, affidavit, and exhibits showing that bank, to which testator had assigned life policies to secure debts, and trustee, to whom testator directed bank to pay balance for specific purpose, failed to account for proceeds and to turn over to executrix mortgages and notes allegedly paid out of proceeds, held to warrant granting of bill of discovery to executrix permitting examination of bank's and trustee's records.—Floyd v. Victory Sav. Bank, 189 S.E. 462, 182 S.C. 357.

Showing of necessity for discovery required

A bill for discovery and relief in equity against the personal representative to charge in his hands the personal estate must show a necessity for the discovery, due to indispensability of the evidence sought and inability to obtain it otherwise.—Price v. Laing, 68 S.E. 24, 67 W. Va. 373.

Failure to show interest of petitioners

An objection that the court was without jurisdiction in citation proceedings instituted by administrators de bonis non to collect assets converted by respondent, a former attorney for the estate, because the affidavit failed to show in what way the administrators de bonis non were interested in the estate, was waived by respondent submitting his account and contesting the matter.—*People ex rel. What constitutes answer

In view of the statutory requirement that all pleadings must be in writing and verified, the fact that respondent in proceeding by administratrix for discovery of property alleged to be withheld was permitted without objection to offer testimony concerning property involved did not constitute a sufficient "answer" within statute.—In re Arthur's Estate, 265 N.Y.S. 668, 148 Misc. 269.

Response erroneously stricken

A verified response filed by respondent and setting forth all the information to which the petitioner was entitled, and facts requiring dismissal of the petition in that there was no concealment, but a claim of title out of the estate, was erroneously stricken.—First Nat. Bank v. Superior Court in and for Apache County, 27 P.2d 525, 42 Ariz. 467.

An unsworn denial of the truth of a sworn allegation in the petition entitles respondent to no relief.—In re Ferrari's Ex'rs, 236 N.Y.S. 406, 134 Misc. 728.

Denial as conclusion

As respects the issues raised, where an answer admitted that decedent gave respondent moneys then in a safe-deposit box in a bank and directed that it be withdrawn and divided with decedent's other children, a denial in the answer that respondent had ever had possession of cash belonging to the estate was a mere conclusion.—In re Halaska's Estate, 30 N.E.2d 119, 307 Ill.App. 176.

come a trial;⁸⁷ but despite respondent's default or failure to raise such issue the court is still required to proceed with the inquisition to determine whether the estate is, at least prima facie, entitled to possession,⁸⁸ and is not deprived of its power to order delivery of any property found on such inquisition to belong to the estate.⁸⁹ Where a discovery proceeding is continued after the death of the original respondent against his executor, the latter may interpose the defense that he finds none of the demanded property among his decedent's possessions reaching the hands of the fiduciary as such.⁹⁰

Amendment or withdrawal of answer. In the absence of statutory provision permitting the amendment of an answer in discovery proceedings as of right, the grant or rejection of an application for leave to withdraw an answer has been held to rest in the court's discretion.⁹¹ In a jurisdiction where an appeal from the final order of the probate court requires a trial de novo the petition may be amended on appeal.⁹²

Demurrer. A purely technical demurrer to a bill for discovery in a probate court should be overruled.⁹³

Reply or replication. The court may be empowered in discovery proceedings to direct the filing of a reply to an answer alleging title.⁹⁴ Where, in a proceeding against an administrator for discovery and an accounting of alleged concealed assets, defendant answered interrogatories submitted, complainants were entitled to reply to such answers to define more clearly and shorten the issues.⁹⁵ A second petition has been held sufficient to form an issue without a formal replication, although petitioner should have been permitted to file a replication offered after the second petition was filed.⁹⁶

Bill of particulars. If the petition in discovery proceedings is sufficient to warrant the order of examination, no bill of particulars may be required of

Distinction criticized

"The attempted distinction between an 'inquiry' and a 'trial' appears to be rather one of nomenclature than of substance. In either situation the ultimate purpose of the proceeding is to determine whether or not respondent has in his possession any property or the proceeds of any property, title, and right to possession of which is vested in the representative. . . . In both cases the result of the proceeding . . . will be a determination, which will be binding and conclusive upon the parties, as to whether or not a concrete recovery by the petitioner from the respondent is permissible."—In re Kevill's Estate, 2 N.Y.S.2d 191, 166 Misc. 230.

Considerations affecting discretion

Where respondent's answer admitted receipt of money from decedent as a gift, and no mistake, omission, irregularity, or defect was asserted, the attempted retraction of the sworn admission raised a strong inference that the pleader was actuated solely by ulterior motives subversive of the ends of justice, which inference should be adequately negated before the court should permit itself to be made a party thereto; and, apart from these considerations, the respondent should not be permitted to withdraw the answer where the ultimate result, if application to withdraw were granted, would be to leave respondents in same position which they occupied.—In re Hossan's Estate, 294 N.Y.S. 516, 162 Misc. 333.

the petitioner,⁹⁷ although a bill of particulars may be demandable from the respondent in amplification of his affirmative answer;⁹⁸ and it has been held, without reference to the right of a respondent to a bill of particulars, that a demand therefor before the filing of a reply ordered by the court was premature.⁹⁹

The interrogatories and the answers thereto in a summary proceeding to discover and recover assets of the estate constitute, in at least one jurisdiction, the pleadings in the cause and make up the issues to be tried,¹ and, as appears infra § 162, are not ordinarily to be considered as evidence. If the answers raise a general issue there can be no judgment on the pleadings,² but if the answers do not raise any issues judgment on the pleadings is proper.³ The original affidavit and the answer thereto are not part of the pleadings, and the filing of a general denial in answer to the original affidavit raises no issue to be tried.⁴

The representative has the burden of proving prima facie that respondent has property belonging to the estate, and the respondent has the burden of supporting his claim to property which is admitted or shown to have belonged to decedent. General rules govern the admissibility, and the weight and sufficiency, of the evidence.

A representative seeking discovery of assets has the burden in the first instance of showing prima facie that the respondent has property belonging to the estate or information concerning such property.⁵ If it is proved or admitted that the property claimed belonged to decedent, a presumption arises that a condition once shown to exist continues,⁶ and the burden shifts to respondent to support his claim⁷ by showing divestiture of such former ownership;⁸ thus, if respondent claims title by gift, the burden is on him to prove a gift.⁹ Where, because

13. Test of prima facie case

Where respondent filed answer denying knowledge or information sufficient to form belief, although administratrix could not rely on default in pleading as an admission of truth of allegations of her petition so as to entitle her to judgment without proof, she was entitled to the same favorable construction that the general rule on a motion for nonsuit concedes to party having the affirmative; thus, in proceeding for discovery and delivery of trust deposit to administratrix as property of intestate, wherein respondent bank put in an answer denying any knowledge or information sufficient to form belief and neither bank nor special guardian for incompetent trustee offered any evidence, test in determining whether administratrix made out "prima facie case" was whether evidence was such as to afford possible basis for reasonable inference that there was an intention to create a trust for the intestate as beneficiary rather than merely to set up the appearance of one for convenience or personal benefit of the trustee herself.—In re Farrell's Estate, 30 N.Y.S.2d 742, 177 Misc. 389.

permits inferences consistent with liability on the one hand and no cause of action on the other.¹⁴ An admission in an answer that respondent received money as a gift negatives any inference that he received it in payment of an obligation or by way of a loan,¹⁵ and even if such answer be withdrawn the petitioner could establish a prima facie case and rebut any such inferences by introducing the withdrawn answer.¹⁶ Where a family relationship existed between decedent and respondents, the mere fact of possession by respondents proves nothing in derogation of decedent's ownership.¹⁷

§ 163. Hearing and Examination

Unless the statute otherwise provides, whether the respondent shall be examined is within the court's discretion; under some statutes written interrogatories and answers are required, but others permit oral examination. Where there is a jury trial, it must be conducted in accordance with applicable statutes and rules of practice.

Where the statutory provision is not mandatory, it is held to be within the discretion of the court whether or not the person against whom discovery proceedings are brought shall be examined.¹⁸ Respondent is the court's witness in the sense that it is the court that calls and examines him, although it does so through attorneys.¹⁹ A person cited for examination has the right to counsel.²⁰ Under an order for the examination of a bank and its cashier to discover assets of deceased, it is proper to examine as a witness the vice president and director of the bank, but not witnesses unconnected with the bank.²¹ Attachment and imprisonment are compulsory means sometimes sanctioned by statute, where respondent fails inexcusably to appear and submit himself, or refuses to answer questions lawfully propounded to him.²²

The interrogatories and answers may be required to be in writing,²³ and in such case the person cited cannot be compelled to submit to an oral examination;²⁴ but the court may be given the right to allow the person cited to be examined under oath and may believe and act on his uncontradicted statements.²⁵ The distributees of the estate cannot file interrogatories to the person cited where the executor or administrator fails to do so.²⁶

Where, by the interposition of an answer raising an issue of title, the proceeding has become a trial, respondent is entitled to a jury,²⁷ and the trial must be conducted in accordance with applicable statutes and rules of practice;²⁸ but, where no answer is interposed, the surrogate acts in a judicial capacity and must determine whether or not the facts adduced on the inquiry warrant the relief prayed.²⁹ In the absence of an affirmative answer entitling respondent to a trial of title, petitioner is not entitled to a preliminary examination, since the discovery sought is in itself substantially an examination before trial.³⁰

Under a statute providing for no trial of title in the discovery proceeding, the testimony of respondent on the examination must be taken as true for the purpose of determining whether or not an issue of title exists, and the administrator cannot impeach such testimony.³¹

§ 164. Dismissal

Discovery proceedings should be dismissed where the situation is not within the scope of the statutory proceedings, or where the court cannot decide whether or not the estate has title.

Where it appears that the situation is not within the scope of the statutory proceedings for discovery, as where there is a mere indebtedness, the proceedings should be dismissed.³² An admission of possession of the property, with a claim of right or title, also justifies dismissal, where such a situation is regarded as ending the jurisdiction of the court;³³ and the same action is proper where the court is unable to decide whether or not the property belongs to the estate.³⁴ Where a trial of title is conditioned on the interposition of an answer raising an issue of title, and a failure to answer has the same effect as a general denial, a motion to dismiss the proceeding at the close of the petitioner's case, in the absence of an answer, is equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence.³⁵ Where the court finds in the executor's favor after his examination under oath, he is entitled to an immediate dismissal without further examination of himself or other witnesses.³⁶ The presumption of ownership arising from possession may warrant a dismissal.³⁷

On a motion to dismiss the petition for insufficiency, the facts alleged therein must be taken as true.³⁸

Effect. The dismissal of one citation under a statute providing for the issuance of a citation to any person who is believed to have knowledge of the existence or location of assets does not preclude the issuance of a subsequent one.³⁹ The dismissal, without prejudice, of a petition filed in the probate court alleging that an administratrix had failed to inventory real and personal property described is not res judicata of a subsequent petition for discovery of assets against the administratrix.⁴⁰

§ 165. Judgment or Order and Enforcement Thereof

The judgment, order, or decree, should conform to Kunst v. Walker, Mo.App., 43 S.W.2d 886.

(2) Where note, which defendant contended decedent intended as gift, was in decedent's possession at death, there was no gift inter vivos, and instruction on that subject was unauthorized.—Thompson v. Bratcher, Mo.App., 8 S.W.2d 1027.

(3) Evidence in administrator's action to discover assets of decedent's estate was held sufficient to justify instruction to find for plaintiff if defendant owned certain property at time of decedent's death and wrongfully withheld and concealed it or any part thereof.—Owens' Estate v. Owens, Mo.App., 107 S.W.2d 150.

(4) In proceedings against an executor to recover assets alleged to have been withheld, where the executor claimed that such property was given to him by his testator, an instruction that, if decedent gave it during his lifetime to the executor, he was not required to inventory it was as favorable to defendant as the facts authorized.—Tygard v. Falor, 63 S.W. 672, 163 Mo. 234.

(5) Defendant's requested instruction that burden of proof was on plaintiff to rebut presumption that defendant owned property in his possession was properly refused, burden of evidence, rather than proof, being involved; and defendant's requested instruction that he was presumed to be owner of property in his possession was properly refused, proper instruction being that jury had right to find from facts and circumstances in evidence that defendant owned such property.—Owens' Estate v. Owens, supra.

(6) Instruction placing burden of proof on plaintiff to establish facts necessary to verdict was held prejudicial error.—Spencer v. Barlow, 5 S.W.2d 28, 319 Mo. 835.

Directing verdict

Where defendant admitted that the property had belonged to deceased and claimed title by virtue of a gift from deceased, which the evidence failed to establish, refusal to direct a verdict for plaintiff was error.—Newell v. Edom, Mo.App., 242 S.W. 701.

the evidence; its effect depends on the statute, the circumstances of the particular case, and the parties that were before the court. Under some statutes the judgment or order may be enforced by contempt proceedings.

An order directing examination into matters, knowledge of which is not essential to the recovery of property of the estate, is to that extent erroneous.⁴¹ The judgment, order, or decree should conform to the evidence;⁴² where the evidence is insufficient to warrant a finding of title to particular property, the court will make no order with respect thereto.⁴³ Where the probate court has the requisite authority to make an order in discovery, it need not set forth in the order the facts on which its right to make it in the particular case depended.⁴⁴

A judgment rendered against respondent should be in favor of the executor or administrator,⁴⁵ unless there is no representative or the proceeding is against the representative, in which case the judgment should be in favor of the state.⁴⁶ Judgment may be for the return of the property or, in the alternative, the payment of its value.⁴⁷

Interest should be required to be paid on funds improperly withdrawn from an estate.⁴⁸

Time for examination. An order granting a bill of discovery should fix a time limit for making the examination and inspection.⁴⁹

Modification, vacation, and resettlement. A final decree which merely determined respondent's liability and the amount thereof, but did not include a direction ordering payment, could not be resettled to include such a direction where the surrogate's decision included no such direction and the executor acquiesced in, accepted, and ratified the final decree.⁵⁰ Where a motion to vacate an order of inquiry is made solely on the face of the petition, the allegations of the petition must be taken as true.⁵¹

Operation and effect. It has been held that an order for delivery of the property to the administrator is an affirmative finding that the person in possession has no claim to the property and is final and conclusive, if not appealed from;⁵² but that a judgment in a proceeding for concealing and embezzling property of the estate, general in form and finding for defendants, is not a determination of rights of property.⁵³ A determination that delivery of a bond and mortgage to respondent was intended as a gift is not binding on the named mortgagee where he was not a party to the proceeding;⁵⁴ similarly, a finding that certain property was a gift from decedent to respondent does not prevent the personal representative from pursuing any right he may have individually as a pledgor of the property.⁵⁵ Under a statute providing only for disclosure and not for any judgment or order, the finding in the probate court that respondent had property of the estate is not conclusive in a subsequent action to recover its value where the value of such property is unliquidated;⁵⁶ but, where the court has authority to direct the delivery of the assets, the citation and order to that effect are certainly prima facie evidence in a subsequent action by the administrator for the value of the assets.⁵⁷

Enforcement. Under appropriate statutory provisions, the judgment or order of the court may be enforced by execution or by proceedings in contempt;⁵⁸ and commitment may be made mandatory unless the surrogate finds that respondent is unable to pay the sum required to be paid or to endure imprisonment,⁵⁹ in which case the surrogate has dis-

§ 166. Review and Costs

In some states, but not others, an appeal from discovery proceedings will lie; where an appeal is proper, it is governed by applicable statutes and rules of court and the general principles of review. Costs may be in the probate court's discretion.

From discovery proceedings by an executor or administrator, an appeal will usually lie as in other cases,⁶² although in some states the right to appeal has been denied.⁶³ Statutory provisions and court rules respecting appeals must be complied with;⁶⁴ as appears in the note, the functions and powers of the appellate court vary in the several states in accordance with the statutory provisions.⁶⁵

Scope of review; determination. A finding of fact on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on review;⁶⁶ and a judgment will not be reversed for harmless error.⁶⁷ The court will not pass on the validity of a provision which the order appealed from does not actually contain.⁶⁸ On an appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to the evidence, the appellate court must assume that the jury made the most favorable findings for appellee that they had a right to make under the evidence.⁶⁹

County court's order, issued in exercise of its probate jurisdiction, overruling motion to quash citation requiring former administrator and another to appear and show cause why certain property should not be delivered to present administrator, was held not "order affecting a substantial right" which would authorize appeal to district court prior to final disposition of cause in county court.—Shaw v. Davis, 62 P.2d 1259, 178 Okl. 334, followed in Bank of Hartshorne v. Davis, 62 P.2d 1261, 178 Okl. 336.

Appeal bond

(1) The right of an aggrieved respondent to appeal is not affected by the fact that other respondents have not signed the appeal bond; the appeal bond should be approved by the county court and not by the clerk, but appellant must be given a reasonable time to remedy such defect.—Mundy's Estate v. (3) Where executrix appealed from an order of the probate court finding that bank account belonged to decedent's estate and should be inventoried, an order dismissing appeal and remanding cause, where questions of fact were presented, was erroneous, since matter was required to be tried de novo.—In re Stahl's Estate, supra.

(4) Circuit court has no jurisdiction to try or dismiss an appeal from county court in a proceeding for discovery of assets of an estate, where there is no transcript from the county court.—Mundy's Estate v. Mundy, 230 Ill.App. 266.

Where a trial by jury has been had as in an action at law, and no declarations of law are asked or given and no procedural errors assigned, the judgment must be affirmed if there is substantial evidence supporting any correct legal theory.⁷⁰ Where the admission of evidence constitutes reversible error, an appellate court having power to pass on the facts and the law and having a composite record sufficient to enable it to determine the issues need not remit the case for further hearing.⁷¹

In a proper case, an order granting a bill of discovery may be modified on appeal.⁷²

Costs in proceedings of the character under discussion are sometimes in the discretion of the probate court.⁷³

VII. COLLECTION OF ASSETS

§ 167. Authority and Duty in General

An executor or administrator has the primary duty to collect the assets of the estate, and he must take into his custody all personal chattels and collect all debts or claims due the estate. He is required to proceed promptly, and he is bound to exercise that degree of diligence which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise in the management of his own affairs.

It is a primary duty of the executor or administrator, to the performance of which his authority of course extends, to collect the assets of the estate⁷⁴ for the benefit both of the creditors and of the next of kin or legatees,⁷⁵ irrespective of the absence of directions in the will,⁷⁶ and irrespective of the validity or invalidity of the directions contained in the will for the distribution of income or the ultimate distribution of the principal.⁷⁷ He cannot give away any asset of value,⁷⁸ and the gift of a claim without the consent of the beneficiaries is void,⁷⁹ but he may abandon worthless assets of the estate.⁸⁰ In general he has the right to and should take into

An administrator is justified in consenting to the withdrawal of a valueless suit which was begun by the deceased.—Carroll v. Arnold, 141 A. 657, 107 Conn. 535.

Disclaimer of right to possession

Administrator's disclaimer of right to possession for three years of undivided third of farm, because of mortgagee's failure to joint administrator in foreclosure proceeding, was not void as abandonment of asset of estate, where under the circumstances right to possession was an extremely doubtful asset.—Morris v. Sherman, 38 P.2d 1012, 180 Wash. 45.

The duty to collect precedes the duty to pay the debts of the estate⁹³ and continues until the estate is settled or the personal representative is discharged,⁹⁴ but after all the debts and specific legacies have been paid or there are sufficient funds on hand to pay them, the executor, before presenting his final account and petitioning for distribution, is not required to pursue and collect all assets of a partnership of which decedent was a member.⁹⁵

*The personal interest of the representative in assets does not affect his right to collect or recover them.*⁹⁶ The fact that an administrator in his individual capacity prior to appointment misled the widow of decedent in paying out funds of the estate, does not prevent him from collecting as administrator the amount she owes the estate.⁹⁷

Where an executor claims property listed as assets of the estate, he has the duty to disclose his conflicting personal claims to the court.⁹⁸

forts to collect,² and to report collections promptly as they are made.³ No definite time is prescribed within which collections must be made, but the general rule is that reasonable time will be allowed,⁴ and one year is usually regarded as a sufficient time.⁵ An executor or administrator is bound to exercise that diligence in the collection of assets which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise in the management of his own affairs,⁶ and he is held to the utmost good faith.⁷ Due diligence depends on many facts and circumstances⁸ not the least of which is the financial condition of the debtor.⁹ Assets for the payments of legacies are not to be collected until the happening of a certain event when so provided by the will.¹⁰

§ 168. Attempting Collection by Suit

An executor or administrator has the right to sue on debts or claims due the estate, and it is his duty to sue where there is a fair chance to realize something by that course; but acting in good faith, with reasonable judgment and sound discretion, he may determine whether or not enforcement of claims by litigation is wise.

An executor or administrator has, of course, the right to sue on debts due to, or claims of, his decedent or the estate,¹¹ and acting in good faith, with reasonable judgment and sound discretion, he may determine whether or not enforcement of claims by litigation is wise.¹² He is not bound to attempt the collection of bad debts or to sue on doubtful claims at the undue risk or waste of the estate or of his private means,¹³ at least without being indemnified for the costs and expenses of suit,¹⁴ but it is his duty to sue where there is a fair chance to realize something by that course,¹⁵ particularly where parties interested in the estate demand this and indemnify him for any expense which may be incurred.¹⁶

As to the time of suing the personal representative has a fair discretion and is not obliged to sue a debtor immediately, at the peril of being chargeable with the amount of the debt.¹⁷ An executor cannot maintain a suit for that part of the estate which is given to the widow by a statutory exemption,¹⁸ and the rule applies whether the total estate exceeds or is less than the amount of the exemption.¹⁹

19. Ala.—Phillips v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

Institute proceedings in the probate court in accordance with statutory provisions.

The representative has necessarily the right to institute and maintain such proceedings as may be necessary for the recovery of the assets of the estate,²⁰ but where a statute prescribes the remedy the proceedings are to be instituted under that statute.²¹ The executor or administrator is not confined to a common law action but may resort to equity in a proper case,²² as where the remedy at law is inadequate,²³ or where a breach of a fiduciary relationship is involved;²⁴ and under some statutes a certain jurisdiction in these matters is given to the probate courts.²⁵ Ordinarily, a summary proceeding is not the proper remedy for the recovery of assets,²⁶ and the mere fact that the administration is in equity does not per se place the assets in custodia legis so as to warrant contempt proceedings against persons who, before an adjudication of their rights, have possession of assets of the estate.²⁷ Under statutes in some states summary proceedings may be had for recovering assets withheld, concealed, or embezzled,²⁸ but such statutes have been held to be applicable only where the person brought before the court has actual possession of, or control over, the property alleged to be embezzled or concealed,²⁹ and to be limited to property remaining unchanged and in specie.³⁰ To establish his right to recover assets, it has been held that the administrator must show that recovery is necessary to the due administration of the estate.³¹ The administrator's legal title to personal property is sufficient to support an action for possession against persons having no interest, but insufficient to support an action against persons entitled to subject the property to claims against the distributees.³² That the administrator of an absent person presumptively dead institutes proceedings to recover the estate from the guardian for the determination of any question that might be raised contrary to the legal presumption of death does not invalidate the proceedings.³³ A bill by an administrator to compel the delivery of chattels, notes, bonds, etc., belonging to the estate, is not a bill for discovery, and can be sustained without first citing defendant in the probate court for examination.³⁴ A demand is not necessary before the institution of a suit by an administrator to recover personal property of decedent held by a transferee under color of title by gift,³⁵ or to recover money from a person whose receipt thereof was wrongful ab initio.³⁶ Although property is in the possession of the executor by agreement, the trial court may determine ownership to the property in an action by the executor against claimant.³⁷

To be entitled to maintain a proceeding as authorized by statute to recover assets claimed to have been transferred by decedent with intent to defraud creditors, the administrator must establish a deficiency of assets to meet the debts of deceased, and the existence of creditors who would be defrauded

by the transfer.³⁸ A determination whether a deficiency exists requires an adjudication of the validity of claims, and the mere fact that unallowed claims have been filed affords no basis for assuming indebtedness to the extent of the filed claim.³⁹

Proceedings for the discovery of assets are considered supra §§ 153-166. Actions by and against representatives are considered infra §§ 688-826.

Venue. A proceeding by a personal representative to recover possession of land of his decedent has been held to be properly brought in the county in which the representative qualified, even though the land was situated, and the person in possession thereof resided, in another county.⁴⁰

Defenses. Openness and notoriety of possession under a claim of title is not of itself a defense unless such claim is of a valid title and is made in good faith.⁴¹ Neither is it any defense to a proceeding brought by an administrator to recover assets of the estate in the hands of defendant, or for the conversion thereof, that plaintiff has in his individual capacity been guilty of wrongdoing.⁴² In a proceeding by an administrator to recover land of his decedent, an averment by defendant that such land "is held and claimed by her as her own, and was so held and claimed by her prior to the institution of this action" is not a sufficient averment of either title or ownership to constitute a defense or to divest the court of jurisdiction.⁴³

Proceedings in orphans' court in Pennsylvania. The powers of the orphans' court in Pennsylvania to assist the representative to acquire control of property rightfully belonging to the estate can only be invoked within the restricted statutory jurisdiction of the court.⁴⁴ The orphans' court cannot assert jurisdiction over property which is not within its control or which was not actually or presumptively in the possession of decedent at the time of his death if the possessor holds under a claim of right, asserts ownership, and is not a fiduciary,⁴⁵ and under these circumstances the representative must seek his remedy by action at law or in equity.⁴⁶ The orphans' court cannot determine the validity of a disputed debt to the estate.⁴⁷ The court has power to determine the jurisdictional fact of possession of the property at the time of decedent's death,⁴⁸ and if the property is presumptively

Jury's determination of ownership of other property

A verdict of the jury in the court of common pleas which is determinative of the ownership of certain property submitted as an issue cannot permit the orphans' court to exercise jurisdiction of other property not in possession of decedent at the time of his death.—In re McGovern's Estate, 186 A. 89, 322 Pa. 379.

Recovery of property claimed as gift

In proceedings involving question whether testator had made a gift causa mortis of a certificate of deposit to his niece who nursed him until his death and to whom testator executed and acknowledged a power of attorney, evidence established a substantial dispute in good faith concerning title to certificate requiring submission of the case to a jury, and the orphans' court was without power to proceed to a final determination of the matter for failure to submit the issue to a jury in the common pleas or to one impaneled by it under statute.—In re Moyer's Estate, 19 A.2d 467, 341 Pa. 402.

Joint bank account

(1) Orphans' court was without jurisdiction to order payment by bank of deposit made by decedent to one who was claiming as surviving joint tenant, since disputed account was no part of decedent's estate and was never in possession or control of his legal representative.—In re Smith's Estate, 15 A.2d 523, 141 Pa. Super. 571.

(2) The appearance of the bank by counsel, admitting that it had the sum in its hands payable to such person as the court might direct, could not confer jurisdiction on the court.—In re Smith's Estate, supra.

Necessity for submission to jury

The submission of a case to a jury on the disclosure of a substantial dispute of title to personalty is not merely a matter of formal procedure unrelated to the question of jurisdiction of the orphans' court, but it is a procedure prerequisite to the final settlement of the issue of ownership, and until it is taken, the orphans' court is without jurisdiction in the case.—In re Moyer's Estate, 19 A.2d 467, 341 Pa. 402.

47. Pa.—In re Brown's Estate, 22 A. 2d 821, 343 Pa. 230—In re McGovern's Estate, 186 A. 89, 322 Pa. 379.

Presumption as to possession

Evidence that certificate of deposit which was allegedly the subject of a gift causa mortis had been in testadecendent's, the orphans' court has jurisdiction to determine whether denial of ownership is made in good faith and whether a substantial dispute as to ownership exists.⁴⁹ The orphans' court may assume jurisdiction to order property to be restored to the administrator if the property was in possession of decedent at the time of his death and no substantial dispute as to ownership exists.⁵⁰

The jurisdiction of the orphans' court to determine questions of title is considered in the title Courts § 303 b.

b. Who May Institute Proceedings and Parties Thereto

As a general rule, the representative is the proper person to proceed for the recovery of assets, but the beneficiary may prosecute claims where the representative cannot or will not act, or where he obstructs the natural course which the law establishes for the transmission of the estate to the heir.

As a general rule, the personal representative is the proper person to proceed for the recovery of assets of the estate,⁵¹ but the beneficiary may prosecute claims where the personal representative cannot or will not act,⁵² or where the personal representative himself, by collusion with the debtor, or otherwise, obstructs the natural course which the law establishes for the transmission of the estate to the heir.⁵³ In a bill for an accounting and to set aside conveyances in fraud of decedent, the fraudulent grantees may be joined as defendants.⁵⁴ Where, on an administrator's application in the probate court to recover rent notes and a lease of certain premises, the order of the court directed that he should dispose of such notes as belonged to his intestate's estate, but made no reference to the interest of certain nonresident defendants as heirs of such intestate, the latter were not parties to such proceeding through the administrator, under a statute providing that if there is no heir or devisee present and competent to take possession of decedent's real estate, the administrator may do so, and demand and receive all rents and profits for the benefit of the persons entitled thereto.⁵⁵

Parties in actions relating to personalty, see infra § 738; in actions relating to land, see infra §, 741.

c. Evidence

Ordinarily, the burden of proof to show ownership is tor's possession until a few weeks before his death, that it remained payable to his order and was never endorsed to alleged donee and had never been presented to bank for payment by alleged donee and that alleged donee was at time of alleged transfer the holder of a broad power of attorney authorizing her to take testator's personalty into her custody created a "prima facie presumption" that certificate was within testator's possession at the time of his death, and hence the orphans' court was justified in concluding that it had jurisdiction over the subject matter of the controversy.—In re Moyer's Estate, 19 A.2d 467, 341 Pa. 402.

Effect of mere denial of ownership

A mere denial of the ownership of decedent unsupported by evidence is not sufficient to show a substantial dispute.—In re Brown's Estate, 22 A. 2d 821, 343 Pa. 230.

Propriety of citation on possessor to show cause

Where personal property is in the possession of one, title of which is claimed by the personal representative of deceased person, it is proper to petition the orphans' court for a citation on the one having possession of the personal property to show cause why same should not be turned over to the estate of decedent.—Pickel v. Hoffner, 27 North. Co., Pa., 166.

on the representative. Letters testamentary are prima facie evidence of the death of the person on whose estate they are issued, and they are conclusive in the absence of contrary evidence for the purpose of enabling the representative to recover the assets. General rules as to admissibility and sufficiency of evidence apply.

Ordinarily, the burden of proof is on the representative to show that the property in the possession of another belonged to decedent,⁵⁶ but the burden to prove a gift of property in decedent's possession at the time of his death is on the one claiming the gift from decedent.⁵⁷ There is no presumption that the children of decedent have in their possession property belonging to the estate, and hence there is no burden on them to disprove such possession.⁵⁸ Where it is established that money was received by defendant under circumstances imputing notice to him of its origin, the burden is on him to show that such payments had been made as absolve him from accounting to the estate for its property which he has wrongfully received.⁵⁹ In proceedings brought by an executor or administrator touching the collection and settlement of the estate, letters testamentary are prima facie evidence of the death of the person on whose estate they are issued,⁶⁰ and they are conclusive, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, for the purpose of enabling the representative to recover the assets.⁶¹

Relevant evidence is admissible,⁶² and it will be held sufficient or insufficient to support a verdict or for other purposes,⁶³ in accordance with the usual rules of evidence.

d. Hearing and Determination

Only matters properly presented can be passed on and only such orders as are within the court's jurisdiction can be made. Assets owing the estate are properly ordered to be turned over to the representative, but the representative is not entitled to recovery where title or right of possession is not established.

Effect of previous fraud on court

That administratrix of deceased owner of stock certificate, in obtaining permission of court to sell stock, failed to disclose that she had previously transferred stock, did not bar her from recovering stock from defendant to whom it had been transferred with notice of defective title, where court's knowledge of facts would have had little bearing, if any, on its judgment, which added nothing to plaintiff's right as administratrix to recover stock certificate.

A judgment will not be rendered against defendant for amounts withdrawn from a bank account with decedent's permission and for his benefit.—Succession of Sharpe, 103 So. 443, 158 La. 61.

Relinquishment of right by decedent

Where in a proceeding by an administrator for the discovery and delivery of assets, the evidence showed that decedent had received certain property under the will of her husband which gave her an estate for life, and that the person in possession of the property had filed a claim against the estate, and claimant, the administratrix, and the remaindermen, agreed on a settlement whereby the administratrix was to have the estate for life, and the remainder at her death was to be divided between the remaindermen and claimant, and claimant bought out the interest of the remaindermen, and the testatrix had disposed of some of the property and turned over to claimant, against whom the proceeding was brought, and her brother, all the assets she had received from the husband's estate, and it did not appear that there were any creditors to whom she was indebted, the application for the pos-

or where defendant has not been given the opportunity to file appropriate pleadings.⁶⁸ In a suit by an executor on a receipt given by defendant for notes which on their face were payable to plaintiff's testator, judgment for the restoration of the claims, and such sums as defendant received on them since the date of the receipt, and an order of reference to ascertain the amount, with interest, were held proper.⁶⁹

e. Judgment or Order and Enforcement Thereof

The judgment should specify with certainty the property to be turned over. An order of the probate court is prima facie evidence of the right of recovery and is controlling under statutes so providing. An order may be enforced by commitment if so provided by statute.

The judgment should specify with certainty the property to be turned over.⁷⁰ An order of the probate court requiring the delivery of property to the administrator is prima facie evidence of his right to recover it,⁷¹ particularly under statutes expressly so providing.⁷² An order of the probate court under a statute authorizing it to make such orders as may be required for the speedy collection of debts is controlling.⁷³ A judgment by default should be vacated where sufficient facts are shown to excuse the default and sufficient merits are shown to require a hearing on the merits in the furtherance of justice.⁷⁴ A decree for the representative in a proceeding to set aside an assignment by decedent on the grounds of undue influence implies a finding that the assignment was obtained by undue influence.⁷⁵

An order for the surrender of property may be enforced by a commitment to jail until compliance if so provided by statute.⁷⁶

§ 170. — Damages for Conversion

One who embezzles, alienates, or converts the property of decedent may be liable for double the value of the property taken under statutes expressly so providing, but some bad faith or wrongful conduct on the part of defendant is necessary to subject him to such penalty.

One who embezzles, alienates, or converts to his own use the property of decedent before the appointment of an executor or administrator is liable for double the value of the property under a statute expressly so providing,⁷⁸ but some bad faith or wrongful conduct on the part of defendant is necessary to subject him to such penalty,⁷⁹ and the term "alienate" as used in the statute signifies a wrongful transfer to another.⁸⁰

§ 171. Possession or Transfer by Heirs or Distributees

The executor or administrator has the right and the duty to recover possession of the assets from those who are beneficially interested in the estate if needed for the purposes of administration, but in the absence of such need he has no obligation to recover possession of property rightfully in the hands of beneficiaries of the estate.

The executor or administrator has the right and the duty to recover possession of the assets even from those who are beneficially interested in the estate⁸³ or their alienees,⁸⁴ where the money or property in question is needed for the payment of debts.⁸⁵ If property rightfully in the hands of the persons beneficially interested is not needed for duly administering the estate, the representative has no obligation to recover possession of it,⁸⁶ and the court will not permit him to prevail in a suit to do so,⁸⁷ in accordance with the principle that the law never requires a vain or useless thing,⁸⁸ and if there are no debts of the estate the representative's right to recover is limited by the rights of the remaining beneficiaries.⁸⁹ Beneficiaries may, by consent or agreement, estop themselves from asserting that another beneficiary wrongfully withholds assets of the estate,⁹⁰ and if by reason of an agreement the beneficiaries are precluded from recovering the assets the representative, in the absence of creditors, is likewise precluded.⁹¹ Funds of the estate in the hands of a third person which have been expended in accordance with an agreement with all the beneficiaries cannot be recovered by the representative,⁹² and a gift of personalty by the sole beneficiary will not be disturbed,⁹³ if the assets are not required for the payment of debts or other administration expenses. While the sale of personal property by the widow or the residuary beneficiary may be disturbed and the assets or their value pursued by the executor or administrator, when needful to settle debts of the estate, intervention by him is not favored where no need therefor is shown.⁹⁴ Money applied by a widow for the payment of legitimate claims against the estate before the appointment of the administrator cannot be recovered from the widow.⁹⁵

Where certain bonds belonging to an estate were exchanged by intestate's husband for other bonds, which latter bonds were delivered to the administrator and retained by him with knowledge of the transaction and without any effort to return them, an assumption that the latter bonds were accepted by the administrator as a pro tanto reparation for the conversion of the original bonds was justified, and in estimating the damages for the conversion the value of the substituted bonds should be considered.—*Storrs v. Avoidance of multiplicity of suits

§ 172. Payments to Heirs or Distributees

A person who pays a debt due the estate to a lawful heir or distributee does not thereby discharge his liability but the transaction will not be readily disturbed where no need appears for holding such person again liable.

A person who pays a debt due to decedent or delivers assets of the estate to the lawful heir or distributee does not thereby discharge his liability to the personal representative⁹⁶ unless such payment has been ratified by the representative;⁹⁷ but the transaction will not readily be set aside or disturbed where no need appears for procuring such assets or holding such person again liable for the debt for the purposes of administration.⁹⁸

§ 173. Secured Claims

An executor or administrator has authority to appropriate and enforce security given to the decedent.

An executor or administrator has authority to appropriate security given to decedent.⁹⁹ A representative who carelessly or dishonestly parts with security to a debtor of the estate renders himself liable for all ensuing loss to the estate.¹ The right of a representative to release a lien is considered infra § 181 c.

An executor or administrator may exercise all the rights of decedent mortgagee in collecting a debt secured by mortgage.² If the mortgage is paid off by the mortgagor, it is the executor or administrator of the mortgagee, and not his heirs or devisees, who should receive payment and acknowledge satisfaction.³ A payment made under an unauthorized agreement with the mortgagee's agent which is ratified by the administrator of the mortgagee must be credited on the mortgage debt.⁴

An administrator as an execution bidder may offer as large a credit on a judgment as his judgment dictates,⁵ but he has no authority to offer more for the property than the amount of the judgment.⁶

An executor owes no duty to sell property pledged to secure a debt after the debt has been paid.⁷

Foreclosure of mortgages. An executor or administrator may foreclose a mortgage by peaceable entry and possession or otherwise, just as his decedent might have done, wherever this becomes needful for realizing on the secured debt or claim.⁸ He must foreclose the mortgage if necessary,⁹ but he is allowed the reasonable discretion of an ordinarily prudent man in the matter,¹⁰ although he is chargeable with negligence if any loss is sustained in consequence of his failure to foreclose, or his delay until the mortgaged property has so depreciated that the full amount of the debt secured cannot be realized.¹¹ Further, the executor or administrator is the proper person to receive the proceeds of foreclosure.¹² Where, after an administrator had obtained a decree foreclosing a mortgage given by his intestate's widow on her interest in the estate, such interest was sold under a probate order and the sale duly confirmed, it was held that such sale did not operate as a payment of the mortgage debt, but merely transferred the estate's security from her interest as heir in the "land" of the estate to her interest in the proceeds of the sale.¹³ Where decedent has made a causa mortis gift of the mortgage to the mortgagor, the executor, in the absence of unsatisfied debts, is without power to foreclose the mortgage.¹⁴

Payment of prior mortgage. It has been held that an administrator has no right to pay off a prior mortgage in order to let in a junior mortgage held

§ 174. Interest on Debts

Interest due on debts is to be collected and the representative is liable for any interest which he has or should have collected.

Interest-bearing debts due the estate are to be collected, with the usual observance of due diligence and good faith, with interest as well as principal.¹⁶ The representative is liable for any interest which he has or should have collected on debts due the estate.¹⁷

§ 175. Foreign Assets

The general executor or administrator is bound to take due measures for the collection of foreign assets.

The general executor or administrator is bound to take due measures for the collection of foreign demands due the estate and other foreign assets.¹⁸ The representative may realize on such a claim by selling and transferring it to a third person,¹⁹ and wherever the general representative may enforce by domestic suit the payment of a debt due from a foreign debtor by means of the voucher or document of title he holds, or because the debtor may be locally reached by process without resorting to the courts where such debtor is domiciled, such suit by him will be locally upheld.²⁰

Collection of assets by ancillary and foreign dom-

§ 176. Property Claimed by Third Persons

The court will require property belonging to a third person which is held by the representative to be returned to the owner. Under statutory provisions, a surrogate's court may try claims of third parties to specific personal property in the possession of the estate representative, providing the claimant is entitled to unqualified and immediate possession.

Where property belonging to a third person is held by the representative, the court will require such property to be returned to the owner subject to whatever claims or liens are lawfully asserted against the property by other persons.²¹ So where an administrator collects the proceeds of a life insurance policy, he must give the entire proceeds to the person entitled thereto and cannot subtract administrative expenses therefrom.²² As to property found among the assets and prima facie part of the estate, the representative should assert title so far as may be proper;²³ but with respect to litigating the title of his decedent to property claimed by third persons, the usual rule of honest and prudent discretion applies.²⁴ Actions against a representative for conversion or detention of property are considered infra § 716.

The purpose of provision in Surrogate's Court Act relating to proceeding to compel delivery of specific personal property by executor was not to transform surrogate's court into a general equitable tribunal but to supply the machinery whereby property in hands of fiduciary on which estate had no rightful claim and which unquestionably belonged to third person could expeditiously be delivered to third person.—In re Jacobs' Will, 28 N.Y.S.2d 296, 176 Misc. 639, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds 31 N.Y.S.2d 536, 263 App.Div. 829.

Evaluation of effect of statute

Although purpose of introducers of statute to compel delivery of specific personality or value thereof by an administratrix is not legally available in proceeding involving its interpretation, proximity in point of time of court decision and date of enactment, identical subject matter treated, and circumstance that result attained on facts of case was exactly ratified and confirmed by enactment, could be considered in evaluation of effect of statute.—In re Mathesen's Estate, 292 N.Y.S. 147, 161 Misc. 367.

Effect of limitations on possible claim

That a possible claim against the estate might have been barred by applicable statutes of limitation did not permit the maintenance of proceedings to compel administratrix to deliver savings bank books standing in name of deceased "in trust for" claimant where the funds were subject to other claims and tax obligations.—In re Kenney's Estate, 11 N.Y.S.2d 685, 171 Misc. 87.

Fulfillment of stipulation predicated recovery

Where the right to recovery is based on an agreement by the administrator to deliver the property after it has been "legally released upon proper proceedings taken, such as estate tax proceedings and otherwise," a proceeding to recover the property before the stipulated proceedings have been had is premature.—In re Kenney's Estate, supra.

Test of applicability of statute

Where subject matter of statutory proceeding to compel delivery of specific personality or value thereof by an administratrix is an article or fund which, if given to person in will would constitute him a specific legatee, party may obtain order directing fiduciary to deliver the article or fund on proper showing of ownership and right to immediate possession.—In re Mathesen's Estate, supra.

Money from general assets of estate

Party to whom deceased expressed orally and by written document desire that certain sum be paid could not maintain proceeding to require administratrix to deliver such sum to him where no specific fund was sought, but merely payment of sum from general assets of estate.—In re Mathesen's Estate, supra.

Money held in trust

Under statute authorizing proceeding to compel delivery of specific personality by an executor, an executor could not be directed to pay over to person claiming money allegedly held in trust by deceased for petitioner a sum in excess of that standing to deceased's credit in savings account, although claimant was not thereby precluded from making claim against estate for balance allegedly due.—In re Polito, 4 N.Y.S.2d 769, 254 App.Div. 806.

Payment of loan prerequisite to return of security

Where a third person's securities hypothecated to secure a loan were redeemed by decedent, such person is entitled to the securities only after payment or tender of the amount of the loan to the estate.—In re Hilliard's Estate, 278 N.Y.S. 675, 154 Misc. 872.

Authority to take mortgaged land

Evidence and agreed statement of facts that a will making defendants executors, without bond with power to sell, and testimony, by an executor that he was authorized to act in the transaction as such, and that whatever he did was satisfactory to the estate, is sufficient to sustain the trial court's conclusion that the executor was authorized to make a contract to take the mortgaged property in full satisfaction of the judgment.—Lobit v. Marcoulides, Tex. Civ.App., 225 S.W. 757, error refused.

Acceptance of depreciated currency. The executor or administrator will not be upheld in receiving payment in depreciated currency,⁵² unless the circumstances show that he acted in good faith and with due prudence for the best interest of the estate.⁵³ Thus in regard to Confederate money, it has been held that, when the representative might have collected the assets in good money before or after the Civil War and failed to do so, he cannot discharge the balance found due from him by payment in Confederate treasury notes,⁵⁴ but when he acted in good faith he is not responsible for the loss of funds received by him in Confederate money or notes which at the time he was obliged to accept,⁵⁵ and the measure of his accountability is the actual value at the time of the collection, and not the face value, of such money.⁵⁶

Payments received in gold at premium. That a representative who receives payment in gold at a time when it is at a premium is chargeable with such premium has been both asserted⁵⁷ and denied.⁵⁸

§ 179. — Extension of Time for Payment

The right of a representative to extend the time for payment of a debt due the decedent has been both affirmed and denied.

It has been held that the representative may extend the time for payment of a debt due his decedent,⁵⁹ but this has also been denied;⁶⁰ and any extension, where the debtor is solvent at the time when the debt is due, is held to be at the risk of the personal representative.⁶¹ In the absence of statute the court has no power to authorize an agreement to extend the time for payment.⁶²

§ 180. — Application of Payments

In case the debtor has not exercised his prior right, the executor or administrator may exercise the right to apply the payment to whichever debt he desires. If neither of the parties has made any application of the payment, the law will apply it to the items of indebtedness which are oldest or least secure.

Where an executor or administrator receives money from a person who is indebted to the estate, he may, in case the debtor has not exercised his prior right, avail himself of the power to apply the payment,⁶³ but he must make the application to debts that are held in the same right as that in which he received the money; that is to say, when he receives the money in his fiduciary capacity he must apply it to the extinguishment of debts due the estate and cannot apply it to a debt due to him personally.⁶⁴ It has even been held that, where he has claims against the same person both in his individual and in his representative capacity, and cannot collect both, he must apply money received from the debtor in payment of the claim due to the estate in preference to his individual debt.⁶⁵ A debtor, on whom the administrator draws an order to pay a certain sum to be credited on a particular debt, has no right without the administrator's consent to change the order so as to make such payment on a different debt, and in case of his paying the order the law will apply it to the debt designated by the administrator.⁶⁶ In case neither of the parties has made any application of the payment, the law will apply it to the items of indebtedness to the estate which are oldest or least secure.⁶⁷ A debtor cannot be required to see to the proper application of payments which he makes to the representative.⁶⁸

a. Compromise of Claims

- (1) In general
- (2) Order or sanction of court
- (3) Effect
- (4) Enforcement
- (5) Attack on and setting aside

(1) In General

In the absence of a statutory prohibition or limitation in letters testamentary an executor or administrator has the right to compromise any demand of decedent provided he acts honestly and with discretion. The claim must be disputed or doubtful and the compromise must be supported by consideration.

In the absence of a statutory prohibition an executor or administrator, as incidental to the power to sue and collect, has the right to compromise any demand of decedent,⁶⁹ provided he acts honestly and within the range of a reasonable discretion for the true interests of the estate,⁷⁰ unless limited by his letters of administration.⁷¹ Nevertheless the responsibility is a perilous one,⁷² and at common law the compromise or release of a debt or claim due the estate was regarded as a waste on the part of the personal representative if it resulted in a loss to the estate.⁷³ In modern times, however, the universal test is whether, in compromising, the representative acted with due prudence; if he did he is protected,⁷⁴ even though it seems probable that the settlement was not the best that could have been made,⁷⁵ while, if he has been guilty of negligence, improvidence, or fraud in accepting less than the full amount due, he is chargeable with the loss.⁷⁶ In general it is only nonassenting parties in beneficial interest who can pursue the representative for an improper release or compromise.⁷⁷ To be a subject of compromise the claim must be disputed or doubtful.⁷⁸ The compromise must be supported by consideration,⁷⁹ and the mere receipt of less than the amount admitted to be due is insufficient.⁸⁰ In accordance with the rules pertaining to contracts generally, an offer to compromise a claim may be withdrawn at any time before acceptance.⁸¹ The fact that a compromise of claims for death and for conscious suffering fails to designate the portion of the total sum paid to be allocated in settlement of each claim does not render the compromise invalid.⁸² Where the widow and children are entitled to the proceeds in a claim for decedent's death, the

(2) Order or Sanction of Court

As a general rule the power of a representative to compromise debts due the estate is not dependent upon the previous sanction of the court unless this is required by statute, but he obtains a more complete immunity from personal liability by securing judicial sanction before the compromise. The debtor has no standing to petition the court to approve a compromise. An order approving a compromise or settlement is in the discretion of the court, but the court cannot arbitrarily withhold its authorization or approval.

In accordance with statutory provisions in a number of jurisdictions, the probate court or other court with jurisdiction of decedents' estates is clothed with jurisdiction to authorize compromises of claims in favor of the estate by executors or administrators,⁸⁵ and under such statutes claims may be compromised by the personal representative with the consent or authorization of the court.⁸⁶ As a general rule, the power of the representative to compromise debts due the estate which he represents is not dependent on the previous sanction of the court,⁸⁷ unless, as is sometimes the case, this is required by statute,⁸⁸ but he obtains a more complete immunity from personal liability by thus securing in advance a judicial sanction of the compromise which he proposes to make,⁸⁹ although the order does not furnish an absolute protection since any party interested in the final settlement of the estate may show that the debt or claim was fraudulently or negligently compromised.⁹⁰ Where the representative acts without such sanction, the burden is on him, if interested parties object, to show that he has acted judiciously and for the benefit of the estate,⁹¹ the court may disapprove the compromise on account-

Construction of statute

A statute authorizing orphans' court to authorize executor, administrator, or guardian to compromise claim in favor of estate of decedent or ward is remedial, and should not be narrowed by construction.—Blum v. Fox, 197 A. 117, 173 Md. 527.

Agreement not constituting compromise of debt

(1) Agreement, whereby administratrix of unpaid deceased seller permitted buyer to keep mules until fall of the year and then pay for them, was held not compromise of debt requiring probate court's authority.—Lee v. Wagner, 47 S.W.2d 33, 185 Ark. 374.

After suit filed to settle estate

(1) After a suit has been filed to settle an estate the chancellor directs the administration and the personal representative cannot compromise a claim without the approval of the court.—Crum's Adm'r v. ing,⁹² and if he has not acted wisely he is liable for the loss.⁹³ An order authorizing an executor to compromise a contested claim due the estate will not relieve the executor from liability for his previous negligence in bringing about the state of affairs rendering the compromise necessary.⁹⁴ A payment for the purpose of effecting a settlement contrary to the court's order is improper.⁹⁵

A statute providing that the court may authorize a compromise is permissive and not mandatory;⁹⁶ the court cannot require the executors to compromise a claim,⁹⁷ but, on the other hand, it is not required to pass on every application of an executor to approve a compromise.⁹⁸ Under such a statute the court may approve a compromise with a debtor who is also an executor of the estate,⁹⁹ but its authority does not extend to an approval of a compromise of the liability of the executor on his account to the creditors and beneficiaries of the estate.¹ Where all the statutory distributees are adults an application for approval of a compromise for the wrongful death of decedent is unnecessary.²

An administrator who is limited by his letters of administration to the prosecution of an action and who desires to compromise the action should apply to the court which issued the letters for a removal of the limitation,³ but a judgment entered in a superior court for an amount agreed on by the parties is valid and does not subject the administrator to contempt of court for violation of the letters of administration from the inferior court.⁴

Who entitled to order. The court may properly approve a settlement by those who are entitled to the proceeds of the debt.⁵ Under statutes authorizing a compromise on a petition by the executor or administrator, a debtor is not permitted to petition the court for an order to compromise the debt,⁶ and the executor or administrator, to be permitted to do so, must be qualified.⁷ The court has no power to authorize settlement for wrongful death by one who has no interest in the claim and who has been appointed administratrix by a false representation that she was decedent's wife.⁸

Notice. Notice to persons interested in the estate is not necessary to the entry of an order consenting to a compromise when not required by statute.⁹ A notice by posting as directed by the court is sufficient.¹⁰

Hearing and determination. The order approving the compromise or settlement is in the discretion of the court¹¹ and it will not be disturbed in the absence of an abuse of discretion,¹² but the court

Reason for rule

The law favors amicable settle-cannot arbitrarily withhold its authorization or approval.¹³ The court may review the discretion of the executor or administrator but cannot substitute its own discretion.¹⁴ Ordinarily a proposed compromise will be approved when apparently for the best interests of the estate¹⁵ and it will be disapproved where the estate is not benefited thereby.¹⁶ An order approving a settlement is in effect a judgment that the settlement is fair and just.¹⁷ In passing on a proposed compromise settlement for decedent's death the court will assume that the compromise represents valid and enforceable obligations.¹⁸ On approval of a compromise the court may require hearings as to how the sum received shall be allocated between distributees and creditors.¹⁹ The court cannot determine matters outside the authority given by the statute.²⁰

(3) Effect

A valid compromise is binding on both parties and on all interested persons represented by the executor or administrator. A compromise without the proper court authorization required by statute is ineffective and it is not binding.

A valid compromise or settlement is binding on both parties.²¹ In the absence of fraud it is binding on all interested persons represented by the executor or administrator,²² and bars a subsequent claim by the heirs or distributee represented.²³ A compromise without the proper court authorization required by statute is ineffective,²⁴ and it is not binding,²⁵ but where the court's authorization is not required the compromise is binding without court sanction although the executor or administrator made an error in judgment.²⁶ A compromise and settlement made with the administrator appointed in the state where the decedent resided at the time of his death is binding on the administrator appointed in the state of the residence of the debtors if the laws of the former state authorized such compromise and settlement.²⁷ A settlement between the sole beneficiary and the party charged is binding on the administrator thereafter appointed.²⁸ Under a statute authorizing an executor or administrator to compound with a debtor for a debt, due with the approbation of the probate court, a compromise by the administrator, with the approval of the probate court, of a suit brought by creditors of a decedent to set aside certain mortgages executed by the decedent, does not bar a subsequent suit by heirs of the decedent against the same defendant involving transfers of other property by the decedent.²⁹ The settlement of a claim on a note with the payee's ment of controversies and prevention of litigation, and exercise, in a fair manner, of statutory power to effect compromises of claims threatening to involve estates in litigation by subordinate tribunal not fully equipped to determine their precise legal merits, should be upheld, in absence of evidence of positive error or injustice.—Blum v. Fox, 197 A. 117, 173 Md. 527.

Chancellor's approval of administrator's unauthorized compromise agreement with relatives of deceased to pay them their part of proceeds of war risk insurance would be abuse of chancellor's discretion, where relatives to whom payment was promised had no legal right to any of proceeds.—*Crum's Adm'r v. heirs does not affect the right of the payee's administrator to collect the sum due.³⁰

(4) Enforcement

The court should enforce a compromise agreement unless a refusal is justified by a proper exercise of discretion or by the presence of equitable considerations.

The court should comply with an application to enforce a compromise agreement unless a denial is justified by a proper exercise of discretion or by the presence of equitable considerations.³¹ A court of equity will not aid in carrying into effect the composition or release of claims by a fiduciary, unless the party praying it makes disclosure sufficient to convince the court that no fraud or mistake existed.³²

(5) Attack on and Setting Aside

A compromise or settlement can be set aside only for bad faith, mistake, or fraud, and only in a direct attack. Averments of fraud do not show the compromise to be void but at most voidable, and one who asserts fraud has the burden of proving it. The administrator cannot avail himself of any situation or technical defect for which he was responsible.

A compromise or settlement made by the executor or administrator can be set aside only for bad faith, mistake, or fraud,³³ and it cannot be set aside in a collateral attack.³⁴ A collusive settlement is not binding on the estate or the distributees or creditors, although the representative had no purpose to favor the debtor,³⁵ and where the administrator, in fraud of the rights of the beneficiaries of a decedent's estate, and in collusion with the adverse party, has settled a claim for the negligent death of decedent, so as to defeat the action of the beneficiaries, the settlement can be opened at the instance of the latter and the original case tried on its merits.³⁶ Where the compromise was authorized by the court, relief must be sought by a bill in equity.³⁷

Averments of fraud do not show the compromise to be void but at most show it to be voidable,³⁸ and one who asserts fraud has the burden of proving it.³⁹ The fact that the amount received in a compromise is small is not a badge of fraud where the claim was doubtful.⁴⁰ The withholding of information as to matters of law where the negotiations are being conducted by attorneys does not amount to fraud justifying setting the compromise aside.⁴¹

In seeking to set aside a settlement the administrator is not entitled to avail himself of any situation or technical defect for which he was responsible.⁴² Where a claim has been compromised, and the approval of the court obtained, and the amount agreed on paid over to the representative, the latter cannot, without paying back at least such an amount as was in excess of the admitted indebtedness, maintain a suit to recover from a party indebted to the estate another amount which he insists represents the true amount of the indebtedness to the estate of his intestate, although such repre-

Materiality of error in judgment

Where devisees under deceased's will moved to set aside probate court order approving a settlement of controversies between administrator of deceased's estate and others on ground that the settlement was obtained by fraud, the question was not whether there was an error of judgment in approving the settlement, but whether the settlement was fraudulent as to the devisees.—In re Fleming's Estate, 293 N.W. 511, 228 Iowa 1137.

No right to compromise claim

A husband who, as administrator of wife's estate, compromised wife's claim against third person's estate for discharge of his individual mortgage, could not avoid accord and satisfaction on ground that he had no right to compromise claim in such manner in absence of showing that he was guilty of fraud or breach of trust.—Wallin v. representative was induced to execute the compromise agreement by the fraudulent representations of the debtor as to the true amount of his indebtedness to the estate.⁴³ The probate court's judgment in overruling a motion to set aside a compromise will be affirmed when supported by substantial evidence.⁴⁴

b. Release of Claims

As a general rule the representative has power to release a claim in favor of the estate provided he acts in good faith and on a sufficient consideration.

As a general rule the representative acting in good faith and on a sufficient consideration has power to release a claim in favor of the estate,⁴⁵ and his action is final if not challenged by an interested party.⁴⁶ On the other hand, if he does not act in good faith and on a sufficient consideration paid to the estate he has no authority to release a claim,⁴⁷ even though the deceased intended to do so,⁴⁸ and he may render himself liable as for a devastavit by so doing.⁴⁹ An administrator is not guilty of a devastavit by merely joining pro forma with a non-resident administrator in the release of a claim.⁵⁰ Where the administrator executes a release but neglects to do so in his capacity as administrator it will be presumed that he intended to execute the release in that capacity.⁵¹ One who seeks to set aside a release as invalid must show that it was invalid under the laws of the state governing the transaction.⁵²

c. Release of Lien

The representative may validly release a lien for adequate consideration where no fraud, collusion, or waste of assets is shown.

The representative may validly release a lien for adequate consideration where no fraud, collusion, or waste of assets is shown,⁵³ but he has no authority to do so for no consideration or for an inadequate consideration⁵⁴ unless authorization has been given by the terms of the will.⁵⁵ Together with the beneficiaries he may release a lien where the assets of the estate are sufficient to satisfy any claims of creditors.⁵⁶ An executor may, when authorized by statute, release a mortgage on payment of the secured debt,⁵⁷ and no court order authorizing the release is necessary.⁵⁸ account for his own debt to the estate. No bar of limitations should operate as long as he is accountable but if the debt is barred before he takes office he is not chargeable with it. The running of interest is not stopped by the inventory of the debt but the money must be actually paid or the amount shown to be actually in the hands of the representative as payment.

The duty of the personal representative to collect debts due the estate of his decedent is not changed by the fact that he is the debtor;⁵⁹ but he must, if solvent or able to pay, pay the debt and account for the amount thereof as assets;⁶⁰ and the security given for the debt is not discharged until payment.⁶¹ No bar of limitations should operate in favor of the representative as long as he remains accountable for the general assets of the estate,⁶² but where the debt is barred before the executor takes office he is not chargeable with the debt.⁶³ The representative is not debarred from showing that the claim against him is unfounded or unjust,⁶⁴ or has been paid;⁶⁵ and it is usually held that he may return the debt as uncollectable when the facts warrant this,⁶⁶ although the contrary view has been asserted.⁶⁷ The probate court must charge the executor with the debts which he owes the estate irrespective of the fact that they may have been omitted from the account and of the method by which the indebtedness is brought to the court's notice.⁶⁸ Where debts due from the representative are secured, the court has no jurisdiction to approve a change in security to the detriment of one class of beneficiaries.⁶⁹ Payments by the executor on a mortgage of decedent to a third person will not be credited as payments on the executor's debt to the estate.⁷⁰

Period for computing interest

(1) Interest on administrator's personal debt to estate was held properly charged only to date decree ordered amount paid, where shortly thereafter amount was reported in lieved from interest by crediting the debt to the estate as collected before maturity.⁷²

§ 183. Failure to Collect Assets

- a. In general
- b. Extent of liability

a. In General

Whether the personal representative is liable for the loss resulting to the estate if any debts are not collected depends on whether he has acted in good faith and with the prudence and diligence which the law requires.

If any debts or assets are not collected, the question of the liability of the personal representative for the loss resulting to the estate depends on his conduct in the premises. If he has acted in good faith, and with the prudence and diligence which the law requires, and has been guilty of no mismanagement, he is not liable,⁷³ but if, on the other hand, a failure to make collections resulted from his bad faith or neglect in the performance of his duties, he is personally liable for the amounts so lost.⁷⁴ Wherever assets come to the possession or knowledge of the personal representative, he becomes liable to account for the same satisfactorily or else stand chargeable in the probate court with their full value,⁷⁵ but it is otherwise where he has had no knowledge of the property or the existence of the final account as ready for distribution, although amount was not in administrator's hands on date of such decree.—McDowell v. Minor, 160 So. 889, 174 Miss. 848.

(2) On restatement of final account of administrator who was also personally indebted to estate, interest at rate of six per cent was allowed on amount found due from date of decedent's death to date of trial court's decree directing that a lesser amount be paid, and from date of trial court's decree to decree rendered on appeal on unacknowledged and unreported balance.—*McDowell v. Collection by executor as attorney for debtor

(1) An executor should not be charged with the difference between what he received from a debtor of the estate and what he would have received from such debtor in the exercise of due diligence, where such executor as attorney for the debtor after suit collected a sum of money out of which he paid the estate a considerable sum with the permission of the debtor, but paid the balance to the debtor, and there was no merit in a contention that he should have advised his coexecutors to consult counsel with a view to securing the debtor's money for the benefit of the estate.—O'Shea v. Hurley, 142 N.E. 919, 248 Mass. 191.

(2) However, where the executor was also attorney for a second estate and collected money for such estate, having previously agreed with administrator to apply collections to debt due by the second estate to the estate of which attorney was executor, he was held chargeable as executor with the amount collected.—*Quillian v. Property fraudulently transferred by decedent

Statutory grant to estate fiduciary of cause of action for recovery of property fraudulently transferred by decedent vests in fiduciary chose in action with respect to which creditors may call fiduciary to account in tribunal of appointment in same manner as creditors may seek surcharge against fiduciary for other misconduct or wrongful dealing with any other asset within his authority, since fiduciary is primarily a "trustee" for creditors.—In re Weinberg's Estate, 296 N.Y.S. 7, 162 Misc. 867.

Desire of deceased incompetent as excusing failure

The failure of a trust company, which had acted both as conservator and executor of estate of incompetent deceased, to collect amounts due estate from a company in which deceased was the principal stockholder, was not justified on ground that deceased incompetent had expressed desire that company's debts all be paid even if it took his own securities and assets to pay them, and that such was to be done to exclusion of the large debt company owed deceased incompetent.—*Nonnast v. debt,⁷⁶ or the evidences of debt never came into his possession.⁷⁷ Loss through failure to take possession of assets before knowledge of his appointment,⁷⁸ or before qualification as executor⁷⁹ is not chargeable against the executor. An executor cannot be held liable for failing to collect assets which do not belong to the estate,⁸⁰ uncollectable debts,⁸¹ or foreign assets which he cannot collect on his domestic appointment,⁸² or for failure to collect assets where no loss results to the estate.⁸³ As a general rule gross negligence is necessary to impose individual liability for failure to collect,⁸⁴ and the representative has been held not liable where the loss resulted from a mistake,⁸⁵ or where the representative acted in good faith and under advice of

Where the loss occurs through the representative's want of due diligence he should be charged with the amount he should have received as of the time he should have received it, and he may be charged with interest on the debt.

Where an executor or administrator was not culpably careless or dishonest, he is chargeable in his accounts for what he actually collects, aside from any prior estimate,⁹¹ but where loss occurs through his want of due diligence he should be charged with the amount he should have received, and as of the time when he should have received it had he used due diligence.⁹² The charge should, however, be limited to the actual loss and cannot be made a penalty for mismanagement.⁹³ An executor or administrator may be charged with interest on the debt which he failed to collect,⁹⁴ but he will not be charged with compound interest if he has not been guilty of willful misconduct or gross delinquency.⁹⁵

VIII. CUSTODY AND MANAGEMENT OF ESTATE

A. IN GENERAL

§ 184. Duties and Liabilities of Representative in General

An executor or administrator is under a duty to take custody of the estate and administer it in such a manner as to preserve and protect the property for ultimate distribution. In the discharge of such duty he is held to the highest degree of good faith and is required to exercise that degree of care and diligence which prudent persons ordinarily exercise, under like circumstances, in their own personal affairs.

The powers and duties of an executor or administrator in respect of the custody and management of the estate are dependent on the terms of the will and the applicable statutes.⁹⁶ In general, it is the duty of an executor or administrator to take custody of the estate and to administer it in such a manner as to preserve and protect the property therein for ultimate distribution to the proper persons.⁹⁷ In the discharge of such duty he is regard-

The obligations of both administrator and trustee to take appropriate steps for conservation of assets committed to their care are identical.—In re Vallonis' Estate, 26 N.Y.S.2d 540, 176 Misc. 110.

Realization of estate

Primarily the power and duty of executors is to realize the estate for the purpose of paying debts and for distribution, and any act of administration which tends to the easy and better realization of the estate is prima facie within their power, since the power to realize implies the proper means of realization.—Peck v. Watson, 142 S.E. 450, 165 Ga. 853, 57 A.L.R. 560.

Authority and duty to collect assets see supra § 167.

Liquidation and conservation

(1) Executors and administrators are under a duty to liquidate and to conserve the assets of the estate, and they should not sacrifice them for inadequate prices.

Administrator of deceased partner

The administrator of the estate of a deceased partner has nothing to do with his interest therein, except to look after it so far as to see that no waste or fraud is committed in its management until the surviving partner has settled up the partnership, paid its debts, and turned over to the administrator his share of what is left.—Grigg v. Attorney for personal representatives of a decedent charged with the duty of administering the estate stands in the same trust relationship to the beneficiary as the personal representatives.—Bar Association of San Francisco v. Cantrell, 193 P. 598, 49 Cal.App. 468.

Collusion

(1) As applied to decedent's estates, "collusion" has been defined as any intermeddling with the executor or the assets of the testator, by which the executor is guilty of a violation of his duty.—Murray v. Blatchford, 1 Wend., N.Y., 583, 623, 19 Am.D. 537.

An administrator or executor must administer or settle the estate with reference to the situation of the assets at the time of the death of decedent.⁵ His acts must be judged according to the facts and circumstances which existed at the time of his action.⁶

It is the policy of the courts to sustain, if possible, an irregular act of an executor or administrator where it is done in good faith and without detriment to the estate.⁷ Mere negligence in the performance of his duties subjects the representative to no liability when no loss to the estate has resulted.⁸

Liability for assets received. A personal representative is liable and accountable to the estate for all assets which have come into his hands.⁹ The accountability is for each individual asset of the estate as a separate unit;¹⁰ as to each such unit, he owes certain well defined duties of prudent care and management, for the breach of which he will be held responsible.¹¹

An executor has been held authorized, on the verbal order of the county judge, to pay over to him any moneys in his hands belonging to the estate or legatees thereof, after which the judge will be liable on his bond for the proper disbursement thereof, such payment discharging the executor from all further liability for the moneys so paid over.¹²

Limiting liability. Unless otherwise provided by statute,¹³ a testator may, by the terms of his will, limit the liability of his executor.¹⁴ Such a limitation, however, does not relieve the executor from all responsibility,¹⁵ and he is still required to act in good faith and with ordinary care.¹⁶

Law governing. So far as the corpus of the estate is concerned, a personal representative's title, rights, and responsibilities are controlled by the law existing at the time of the transfer of the estate to him.¹⁷

§ 185. Custody of Assets, Books, and Papers

The personal representative is entitled to the custody of the assets, books, and papers of the estate.

The personal representative is entitled to the custody of the assets of decedent,¹⁸ and he should not be required to surrender the estate committed to him before a distribution is ordered, unless for grave reasons.¹⁹ Since an administrator is an officer of the court, see supra § 147, his custody of the property of the estate is deemed to be the custody of the court.²⁰

Books and papers. The representative is entitled to the custody of the books and papers of the estate,²¹ but he must allow persons interested to inspect the deeds and other documents relating to lands devised, for which purpose the court may require him to produce them.²² Whether an executor or administrator should allow persons contesting the will of deceased to examine his diaries or other private papers may depend on the contents of the papers and the use that could be made of them.²³

§ 186. Keeping Accounts

Executors and administrators should keep separate books of accounts of the estate.

Executors and administrators should keep separate books of accounts of the estate,²⁴ and if they fail to keep their accounts properly they will be held to a strict liability.²⁵

§ 187. Deposits

An executor or administrator may generally deposit the funds of the estate temporarily in a reputable bank, and if due care is used in selecting the depository he will not be held responsible for a loss resulting from the subsequent failure of the bank.

In the absence of any statutory or testamentary direction, it is a matter requiring the exercise of sound judgment and discretion on the part of the personal representative of an estate to determine whether its funds should be kept on his person or deposited in a bank or other safe place.²⁶ Generally it is proper for the executor or administrator,

After assets of an estate have been recovered in an equity suit and reduced to possession, they are equitably appropriated to the uses of the estate.—Turk v. Grossman, 6 A.2d 639, 176 Md. 644.

Testamentary and dative testamentary executors

A testamentary executor who is given seizin of all the property may administer all the property, but neither a testamentary executor nor a dative testamentary executor can require seizin or possession when the same is not conferred by the will.—Succession of Patterson, 175 So. 820, 188 La. 113.

Where an executor, whose letters have been revoked, has in his possession cash and securities not derived from the sale of realty, and the infant heirs and widow are without means of support, it is improper to deny a motion by the administratrix to compel the executor to turn over assets to her, on the ground that the executor has been ordered to account; but he should be ordered to deliver a portion to the administratrix, and to retain the remainder, including the proceeds of real estate, for which the heirs may compel him to account.—In re Clark, 179 N.Y.S. 145, 189 App.Div. 771.

where he fails to exercise due diligence and good faith,³² as, for example, where he deposits the funds of the estate, or permits them to remain, in a bank which he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence might have known, to be insolvent or unsafe.³³ He may also incur liability for loss in case of the bank's failure where the deposit is needlessly made³⁴ or is left too long for a prudent course of administration,³⁵ or where he lends for a fixed time to a bank instead of making a deposit subject to withdrawal at pleasure or lending as payable on demand.³⁶

After time for distribution

If an executor or administrator deposits money of the estate in a bank and allows it to remain on deposit after the time when it should have been distributed, and the money is lost by the failure of the bank, he is liable for the loss.—Woodley v. Holley, 16 S.E. 419, 111 N.C. 380.—24 C.J. p 51 note 16.

Nature of permanent deposit

Permanent deposit in bank by personal representative is in nature of loan or investment made on mere personal security.—Jones v. O'Brien, 235 N.W. 654, 58 S.D. 213.

Deposit on time certificate; custom and practice

A deposit on a time certificate will not render a personal representative liable where by virtue of the existing custom and practice he believed, and was justified in believing, that the certificate which he took, regardless of its form, would be paid whenever demand was made, and where it does not appear that the fact that the certificate was payable at a fixed future time instead of upon demand in any way contributed to the loss of the money.—Jones v. O'Brien, supra.

the deposit, that the funds belonged to the estate.⁴⁴ However, a mere defect in designating his fiduciary capacity will not render a representative personally liable where the deposit has at all times been recognized as belonging to the estate and where the bank is chargeable with knowledge of the trust fund nature of the deposit.⁴⁵

Bank executors. Generally, when a bank is named as executor or administrator under a statute authorizing it to act as such, it may, to the same extent that it could deposit and retain the funds of the estate in another bank, deposit such funds with itself and retain them in the usual and customary manner.⁴⁶ However, it has been stated that estate funds must be deposited in a banking institution other than one acting as executor or coexecutor of the estate.⁴⁷

Commercial or savings account. In determining whether a personal representative should deposit the funds of the estate in a commercial account or a savings account various factors must be considered.⁴⁸ Under ordinary circumstances,⁴⁹ as, for example, where the funds are to be in his hands for a very short time or where practically all of the funds will be required for the immediate needs of administration,⁵⁰ deposit in a commercial account subject to check is proper. On the other hand, where there is a substantial sum in excess of the immediate requirements and such sum is to be held over a period of time which will permit the accrual of interest on a savings bank deposit, he should deposit the funds in a savings account rather than in a noninterest-bearing commercial account.⁵¹

In this connection it should be noted that the deposit of money in a bank at interest temporarily pending the closing of administration is usually held not to be an investment within the meaning of statutes limiting or prohibiting investments by executors or administrators.⁵²

Consent of beneficiaries. The consent of the beneficiaries to a deposit will relieve the personal representative from liability to them for a loss resulting therefrom.⁵³

The fact that deposits made by a representative as administrator did not designate the estate to which the funds belonged did not render the representative personally liable on failure of the bank, where it appeared that before the bank closed the name of the estate was designated on the books of the bank and where it also appeared that the name of the estate appeared on the only checks drawn against the deposits.—Jolly v. Retaining necessary expense money

Bank, as executor of estate, had right to keep on hand funds necessary to defray current expenses of estate and preferred claims.—Ex parte Michie, 165 S.E. 359, 167 S.C. 1.

Commingleing with other funds

(1) Act permitting bank trustees to deposit funds of estate in own savings department and mingle funds is not unconstitutional as discriminating in favor of bank trustees, and a bank acting as executor may deposit funds of estate in own savings department as general deposit commingled with other funds.—In re Smith's Estate, 297 P. 927, 112 Cal.App. 680, followed in In re Brenhart's Estate, 297 P. 931, 112 Cal.App. 766, and In re Slingsby's Estate, 297 P. 931, 112 Cal.App. 767.

§ 188. Gifts

The executor or administrator has no right to give away any assets of the estate.

The executor or administrator has no right to give away any assets of the estate even though of trifling value, nor will the law give effect to such transfer.⁵⁴ Where an unauthorized gift is made, it may be recovered from the donee or the executor.⁵⁵

Where title to property is transferred to an estate for a specific purpose and with no intention to make a gift to the estate, the executors become trustees thereof for the beneficial owner.⁵⁶

§ 189. Performance of Decedent's Obligations

Personal representatives are bound by the outstanding covenant or contract obligations of their decedents except where the obligation is personal in its nature or is terminated by decedent's death or is otherwise discharged.

With respect to personalty, no person is individually responsible for the obligations of a decedent as a matter of law.⁵⁷ In their representative capacity, however, executors and administrators are bound by all the covenant or contract obligations of their decedents,⁵⁸ except such as are personal in their nature and of which personal performance by the decedent is of the essence,⁵⁹ or such as are terminated by decedent's death,⁶⁰ or are otherwise discharged.⁶¹ Where the personal representative neglects or refuses to carry out the contract of his decedent, the other party has the usual remedies, as in electing to treat it as rescinded and claiming damages,⁶² or applying to the court for an order of com-

Where decedent, in selling dry goods business, agreed to take back business if buyer should become dissatisfied, decedent's administrators, who entered into agreement with buyer to take back goods at agreed inventory price, and to pay buyer's debt to bank, could not escape liability to bank's receiver in suit on contract, on ground that expenses in selling goods reduced amount in hand so that it was insufficient to pay bank and that probate court had not authorized contract, since taking back at inventory price was pursuant to decedent's agreement and needed no court authority.—Seward v. Executing corrected conveyance

Where decedent, if he had lived, could have been compelled to reform contract containing wrong description of real property and make conveyance as reformed, conveyance by executrix on order of county court authorizing conveyance as corrected should not be declared void as requiring first obtaining of decree of reformation in court of equity, since same result was accomplished without court proceeding.—Gilbert v. Hanson, 205 N.W. 704, 49 S.D. 10.

Effect of refusal to accept performance by representative

Where the personal representatives of a deceased contractor in good faith offer to complete his contract, and the other parties refuse to accept it, and decline to permit the personal representatives to proceed, they are relieved from further performance and are entitled to an accounting and recovery as upon a quantum meruit.—*Burch v. Arbitration

Where a personal contract containing a provision for arbitration at the choice of either of the parties was terminated by the death of one of the contractors, his executrix was entitled to arbitration on the question of the value of the benefits conferred, notwithstanding a provision in the contract that payments were to be made at the rate of a certain per cent of the value of the work installed as the work progressed.—*Buccini v. The personal representative may avoid his decedent's contract or covenant on the usual grounds of incapacity, illegality, or fraud,⁷⁰ or suspend performance where the other party is bound to proceed first;⁷¹ and in some instances an executory contract inequitable in its consequences to the estate may be avoided or compromised,⁷² or an onerous obligation may by its own terms admit sometimes of a legal or equitable rescission by the personal representative.⁷³

Where the personal representative performs the contract or covenant of his decedent and completes the transaction, the estate will be held bound for any loss sustained thereby, and will be entitled to any profit realized in consequence.⁷⁴

As between the representative and the beneficiaries of the estate the former may in his discretion, as a general rule, perform or rescind any personal contract of decedent as may be for the best interests of the estate,⁷⁵ unless the matter is regulated by statute.⁷⁶ However, a personal representative is under a duty to see that his own private interests are not taken care of at the expense of the estate or its beneficiaries.⁷⁷

Compelling payment of debt

Administratrix of estate of intestate, who permitted pledge of his property to trust company by another as security for loans to latter, could compel borrower in equity to pay debt secured, if financially able, and thus release property from pledge.—Killoren v. Hernan, 20 N. E.2d 946, 303 Mass. 93.

Maintaining bill to exonerate pledged property

Administratrix of estate of intestate, whose securities were pledged as security for loans to another, may maintain bill to exonerate from lien of pledge such securities or amount thereof not required to pay note for loan, made before intestate's death, after applying beneficiary's collateral in satisfaction thereof; the right to exoneration in such case cannot be limited or curtailed because of loan made after intestate's death.—Killoren v. Hernan, supra.

ed trustee under a will he comes into possession as executor, and his election afterward to hold as trustee must be manifested by some plain and unequivocal act.⁸²

When the functions of the executor or administrator as such have ceased, he holds whatever balance there may be in his hands in his other capacity, whether as trustee, guardian, legatee, distributee, or otherwise.⁸³ However, there is authority that where two or more fiduciary functions coexist at the same time and no point of time is fixed in the testamentary intention at which one function should end and the other begin, the duty of the executor continues.⁸⁴

In case of the representative's misappropriation or default the loss should be sustained in what was then his true character.⁸⁵

§ 192. Rights of Creditors

Creditors may resort to a court of equity to preserve the estate when the personal representative fails to perform his duty.

Creditors may resort to a court of equity to preserve the property and assets of the estate and subject the same to the payment of debts against it when the personal representative fails to perform his duty in the premises.⁸⁶

B. ENGAGING OR CONTINUING IN BUSINESS

§ 193. General Rule

An executor or administrator ordinarily may not engage in business with the funds of the estate, and if he does so he is chargeable with all losses incurred and profits made.

Subject to certain limitations and exceptions discussed infra §§ 194-197, as a general rule an executor or administrator is not justified in placing or leaving assets in trade, for this is a hazardous use to permit of trust moneys and trading lies outside the scope of administrative functions.⁸⁷ This is

Breach of trust

(1) Executor should insist that testator's business be sold or liquidated as soon as reasonably possible after testator's death.—In re Kinreich's Estate, 244 N.Y.S. 357, 137 Misc. 735.

(2) However, where testator acquired interest in corporation engaged in marketing equity in realty and partnership engaged in marketing mortgages, and became personally liable on indorsement on notes of such concerns, testator died, and depression resulted in failure of such concerns and revealed for first time the irresponsibility of others interested therein, executor was not liable to estate for failure to bring about liquidation and enforce contribution before depression.—In re Strassenburgh's Estate, 300 N.Y.S. 1016, 164 Misc. 445.

(2) Where executor neglected duties in maintaining testatrix' furnished room business, but entire property was finally leased to some one in like business, executor was chargeable with difference between rent fixed by such lease and net operating profits for preceding year, but entitled to credit for nonhouse-keeping expenses, and was not chargeable with testatrix' weekly earnings in such business.—In re Rodgers' Estate, supra.

(3) Tentative rental surcharge made against accounts of executor charged with neglect of duty was solely for benefit of general legatees, not for benefit of residuary legatees who participated in, and were beneficiaries of, executor's alleged nonfeasance and misfeasance, or for benefit of their mortgagee.—In re Rodgers' Estate, supra.

Debts of estate at time of death

Executrix, continuing testator's business without authority, resulting in losing practically all assets of estate, was surchargeable with valid debts of estate at time of testator's death.—In re Selgrist's Estate, 262 N.Y.S. 629, 146 Misc. 236.

Stock control of corporation

Where deceased's complete stock control of corporation passed to executor, executor's possession of right to receive dividends, to vote, and to receive all of net assets of corporation on dissolution after payment of obligations of corporation was fiduciary, and he was answerable to creditors of corporation and distributees of estate for his conduct in respect to corporation.—In re Steinberg's Estate, 274 N.Y.S. 914, 153 Misc. 339.

Authorized deductions

(1) Where administratrix undertook to carry on business of deceased on her own initiative, payments made out of gross receipts for rent due landlord and water rent, both of which were due at death of tenant, and refund of insurance premiums would be credited against apparent loss from the business.—In re McClatchey's Estate, 11 N.Y.S.2d 266, 170 Misc. 696.

(2) Administratrix was not entitled to credit for portion of license fee where it was not shown that any license fee had been prepaid for a period which extended beyond date of sale.—In re McClatchey's Estate, supra.

(3) Balance remaining after authorized deductions was surcharged to administratrix for purpose of computing amount payable to objecting creditor, which amount was required to be paid by administratrix out of her own resources and

tors who carried on the business of testator, and, without an order of court, sold goods on time without security, responsible for a loss therefrom, although the total profits from their sales exceeded the losses on such unsecured debts.⁹⁰ Beneficiaries under a will are also entitled to offset their claim to a fair rental value of premises connected with a business continued by the executor without authority against payments made by him for the benefit of the estate by continuing the business.⁹¹

The accountability of the representative with respect to profits extends only to the actual net profits made during the period in which he carried on the business,⁹² and it has been held that in estimating the net profits only profits resulting from the employment of testator's estate should be considered, making allowance for the business skill and credit of the executor in conducting the business.⁹³ However, since the representative cannot deal with the property to his own advantage, he is not entitled to a salary for his own services to be deducted from the gross receipts;⁹⁴ and one who pays to himself an excessive salary and bonuses is liable to account to the distributees of the estate.⁹⁵

Speculative accounts of decedent should be settled by the personal representative within a reasonable time,⁹⁶ and the representative is not excused from liability by the fact that he acted in good faith and with ordinary prudence in carrying the account.⁹⁷

§ 194. Limitations of Rule

The general rule that an executor or administrator has no authority to continue the operation of the decedent's business is subject to some limitations, as where such operation is necessary for the protection of the estate or is authorized by statute or order of the court.

Good discretion may require some latitude in closing out decedent's business, and this a probate court will duly consider when passing on the representative's accounts.⁹⁸ Statutes sometimes authorize an executor or administrator to carry on the business if it is not necessary that it should be sold at once for the payment of debts,⁹⁹ although under such statutes the personal representative acts at his peril if he continues the business without authority from the court.¹ The personal representative may be justified in continuing the business so far as is necessary for the purpose of winding up the same and converting the assets into money² or carrying out

existing contracts of decedent,³ or when necessary for the preservation of the estate,⁴ and the law does not contemplate that he should sacrifice the interests of the estate in order to bring it to a close.⁵ An administrator is not chargeable with a loss incurred during his operation of decedent's business where a greater loss would have resulted from closing it.⁶ In agricultural states a temporary management of a plantation by the personal representative of the deceased owner, under judicial supervision for the benefit of all concerned, is sometimes permitted,⁷ in order that crops commenced by decedent may be completed for the benefit of the estate;⁸ and a personal representative who finds a commodity on hand may lawfully, acting in good faith, put it in a condition in which it is usual to sell it, or in which under the circumstances it can best be sold.⁹

The general rule is also subject to some limitations where the executor is the residuary legatee¹⁰ or the business has been specifically bequeathed to him;¹¹ and the consent of all persons interested may authorize the personal representative to carry on the business in good faith so as fairly to be allowed for all assets so consumed,¹² but the burden lies on the personal representative to show such consent on a full understanding of all the circumstances.¹³

A statute authorizing any person interested in an estate to obtain an order of the court controlling the action of the personal representative carrying on a business belonging to the estate imposes a duty on such person to apply for an order.¹⁴

Unlawful business. An administrator carrying on an unlawful business of decedent is not chargeable with fees received therefrom.¹⁵

Limitation on power of court

The ordinary has no authority to authorize an administrator to incur an indebtedness on account of the estate which he represents for the operation of a farm belonging to the estate beyond the calendar year in which the administrator qualified; and the statute giving an administrator authority to make an advance to a minor heir out of the assets of the estate could not be relied on as authorizing the incurring of such an indebtedness.—Harris v. O'Quinn, Ga. App., 17 S.E.2d 758.

plete authority in the settlement of estates have been held to confer jurisdiction to direct the continuance of the business of decedent pending administration proceedings.¹⁸

As incidental to authority from the court, a personal representative may employ the ordinary means which are necessary and proper to effectuate the express power,¹⁹ but he has no authority to keep up the family establishment and support the family at the expense of the estate.²⁰ An order made on the consent of all the heirs authorizing the administrator to sell a stock of goods at private sale does not authorize the continuance of decedent's business to the extent of replenishing the stock of goods on hand.²¹

§ 195. — Testamentary Directions

When authorized by the will the executor may carry on the decedent's business and if he acts in good faith and with ordinary prudence he is not accountable for losses.

Where authority to carry on decedent's business is plainly²² conferred on an executor by the will, he may lawfully exercise the power so conferred,²³ but

Purpose of statute is largely to add to the assets of the estate, directly or indirectly, through operation of business, and to permit business of a decedent to be continued under direction of the court, for such benefits as might accrue to all concerned, thereby relieving administrator of personal liability therefor, but not to give to those advancing credit on the business a preference over other creditors who may have contributed to assets in hands of administrator.—In re Allen's Estate, 108 P.2d 973, 42 Cal.App.2d 346.

Jurisdiction

District court has jurisdiction of administratrix' application for authority to continue business under lease to deceased, and lessor procuring denial of administratrix' application for authority to continue business cannot deny court's jurisdiction or assert that order was discretionary.—In re Grooms' Estate, 216 N.W. 78, 204 Iowa 746.

Dispensing with equity proceeding by beneficiary

Statute affords plain, complete, and adequate means by which curator appointed by county judge may apply to circuit court for authority to conduct going business of deceased, so that resort to equity by beneficiary of estate was unnecessary.—Anderson v. Spencer, 149 So. 658, 111 Fla. 760.

Notice of application

(1) Order granting executor's application to continue testatrix' business was unauthorized, where manner in which notice of application should be given to persons interested in estate was not ordered by court.—In re Ward's Estate, 15 P.2d 901, 127 Cal.App. 347.

(2) Order directing administratrix to continue decedent's private banking business was not void because made without notice to creditors.—In re Harsh's Estate, 218 N.W. 537, 207 Iowa 84.

Determination of validity of order

Validity of order directing administratrix to continue decedent's business must be determined in view of business as it appeared from apparently complete records.—In re Harsh's Estate, 218 N.W. 537, 207 Iowa 84.

Limitation as to scope of business

Order directing administratrix to continue decedent's private banking business was not void because not limiting continuance to winding up of decedent's affairs.—In re Harsh's Estate, 218 N.W. 537, 207 Iowa 84.

Order made during pendency of equity suit for accounting

Order continuing operation by executors of deceased's business during pendency of equity cause for accounting and receivership was not error, where executors were making monthly reports to judge, gave bond, and successfully handled business.—Wingate v. Mach, 157 So. 421, 117 Fla. 104.

Order contrary to testator's intention

Where to follow terms of will by not operating farm beyond certain period would result in permanent impairment and partial destruction of estate, court could authorize executor or trustee to operate farm for another year.—Low v. First Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Vicksburg, 138 So. 586, 162 Miss. 53, 80 A.L.R. 112.

Liability of executors for loss

Where will gave executors power to sell land, but authorized demise thereof until sale, executors could not be surcharged with the apparent loss resulting from farming operation where they acted reasonably, in good faith, according to best judgment, and under court's authorization in operating farm, while endeavoring to make sale at satisfactory price.—Goldsborough v. De Witt, 189 A. 226, 171 Md. 225.

Claim under void order

Order allowing executrix to continue testator's business and allowing her one hundred fifty dollars per month as for bookkeeping is void, where statute authorizing such expenditures was not effective until after issuance of order, and executrix' claim was properly disallowed, where, during period executrix conducted business, allowance amounted to one thousand one hundred seventy-five dollars, and profits were only fifty-seven dollars, executrix did not, in fact, act as bookkeeper, and there were substantial claims against estate on which nothing had been paid.—In re Larzelere's Estate, 41 P.2d 362, 4 Cal.App.2d 438.

Direction to incorporate business

Where will directed executors to incorporate testator's business and distribute the stock to beneficiaries in specified manner, the death of a beneficiary before the incorporation of the business did not preclude executors from proceeding with the corporation. However, under a testamentary provision that it was testator's desire that his business be carried on, "but in such way if possible as will not interfere with the immediate settlement of my estate," directing executors to incorporate the business, and authorizing them in case it should become impracticable for any reason to form such corporation to make any other arrangement they may think best, the executors could not for a period of two years delay the incorporation of the business in the expectation that the federal Excess Profits Tax Law would be repealed or changed, and the tax thereby avoided, but exhausted the powers conferred on them by continuing the business during such period as a partnership, since such delay interfered with the "immediate settlement" of the estate, in violation of the will.—In re Scott's Estate, 124 A. 270, 280 Pa. 9.

§ 196. Liability for Debts

- a. In general
- b. Where continuance of business unauthorized

a. In General

Generally the executor or administrator authorized to carry on the business of the decedent is personally liable for all debts incurred therein unless the parties agree to look to the funds of the estate exclusively; but assets of the estate invested in the business at the time of the death of the decedent may be made liable therefor, and in a proper case, the creditor may resort to such assets. An executor or administrator is not personally liable on contracts made while the business was operated by a legatee for his own benefit.

Acquiescence of creditors

Administratrix, who continued decedent's nursery business with acquiescence of creditors for three years under court order authorizing nursery contracts to be carried out, was not liable to creditors for alleged waste, where such business operations resulted in losses.—Hicks v. Purvis, 182 S.E. 151, 208 N.C. 657.

Carrying out contract of deceased

(1) Unless contracting individually, administrators of employer who, after his death, carry out employment contract with clerk, are not individually liable for salary.—Hall v. Durham Loan & Trust Co., 158 S.E. 388, 200 N.C. 734.

(2) Performance of decedent's obligations generally see supra § 189.

Claims as expenses of administration

Claims for goods sold on credit to decedent's business while operated by the representative under order of court were not "expenses of administration," either under statute authorizing the making of an order authorizing an administrator to continue the business of decedent, or under statute giving the order in which debts, expenses, and charges against an estate are to be paid.—In re Allen's Estate, 108 P.2d 973, 42 Cal.App.2d 346.

Equitable considerations

Obligations incurred by executors in carrying on testator's business are proper charges against estate only if equitably payable out of assets, and where executors were not guilty of misconduct or gross negligence in carrying on testator's business, obligations were payable from assets.—Hewitt v. Beattie, 138 A. 795, 106 Conn. 602.

Implied power to incur debts

Executor empowered to carry on farming operations has implied limited power to incur debts on credit of estate for needful supplies.—Clark v. Tennessee Chemical Co., 145 S.E. 73, 167 Ga. 348.

Lien or preference

Although the effect of the statute authorizing the making of an order to permit decedent's personal representative to continue his business is to enlarge the powers of the representative of the estate and to make claims arising under such circumstances a charge against the estate, rather than one against the administrator, no lien or preference is created thereby.—In re Allen's Estate, 108 P.2d 973, 42 Cal.App.2d 346.

To render judgment against representative payable from assets of estate, creditor must show that obligation on which judgment was based arose out of transactions of executrix in representative capacity, in carrying on decedent's business.—In re Bucks' Estate, 170 A. 373, 113 Pa.Super. 193.

34. Ark.—Beneux v. Brown Shoe Co., 87 S.W.2d 28, 191 Ark. 579.

Where the personal representative is authorized to carry on the business of decedent, the circumstances of the particular case may be such as to make it proper to charge the debts incurred in the conduct of the business against the estate and not against the representative individually,³³ but the general rule is that the representative is personally liable for all debts contracted in rightfully carrying on the business,³⁴ unless he exacts an agreement from the person with whom he deals to look to the funds of the estate exclusively,³⁵ although, as shown infra § 238, he has a right to be indemnified out of the estate.

It has been held, however, that the creditor may resort to the estate in a proper proceeding for payment of his claim.³⁶ Thus, in a proper case the creditor may be subrogated to the representative's right of indemnity,³⁷ and it has been held that he may maintain a suit in equity to charge the estate

Knowledge of authority and insolvency of estate

Person selling tea to executors carrying on business of estate under authority of probate court was not estopped to assert claim for price of tea against executors by knowledge that business was being carried on by executors under decree of probate court, of the unsound financial condition of business, or the insolvency of estate owning business, in the absence of evidence that executors were induced to continue to operate business or purchase tea by fraud, misrepresentation, or other unfair conduct of seller, delivery of tea sold on personal credit of executors for use in operation of the business of the estate being sufficient consideration for executors' implied promise to pay.—*Anglo-American Direct Tea Trading Co. v. where the executor is insolvent.³⁸

Where executors under the will of a testator, who had been conducting a mercantile and manufacturing business on borrowed capital, not being authorized by the will to carry on the business, but carrying it on by agreement of all parties interested for the purpose of preserving the business as a going concern, in good faith borrowed money from the mother of one of the executors to use in the business, the son under authority from the other executors signing the note in the name under which the testator conducted the business by himself "as executor," and the money was used in discharging debts of the business and later the executors sold the business to a purchaser who agreed to assume and pay all debts incurred by the executors in carrying on the business, it was held that the lender could maintain a suit in equity to recover the amount of the loan from the purchaser.³⁹

What assets liable. At common law, where the representative is authorized to carry on the business, only such assets of the estate as are invested in the business at the time of decedent's death can be considered as trade assets, and in the absence of some clear authority in the will the other property of the estate cannot be made liable for debts contracted by the representative in carrying on the business.⁴⁰ Nevertheless, where adequate authority is given by the will, a representative may bind the general assets by a purchase of goods on credit for the business.⁴¹ Further, by virtue of statutory provisions authorizing the personal representative to carry on a business belonging to the estate, debts incurred in the conduct of the business may become a charge on the general assets of the estate,⁴² but under such statutes the general assets are not subject to a charge incurred in the operation of the business of a corporation whose stock was owned solely by decedent.⁴³

Where heirs and general creditors consent to the continuance of the business, the estoppel resulting therefrom relates only to the liability of trade assets, and there is no estoppel to deny the liability of general assets for debts incurred in carrying on such business.⁴⁴ Bad debts and losses, and the expense of replacing old articles with new, are properly charged against the profits and not against the capital.⁴⁵

Where business carried on by legatee. Where testator bequeathes his business to a third person, who carries it on for his own benefit, the executor is not personally liable on contracts made in the course of the business, in the absence of any acts on his part raising an estoppel.⁴⁶

b. Where Continuance of Business Unauthorized

Where the executor or administrator acts without authority in employing the assets of the estate in business, he is personally liable for all debts incurred in the course of the business, and the creditor cannot look to the estate.

Where an executor or administrator acts without authority in employing the assets of the estate in business, all debts contracted in the course of such business are the personal debts of the representative, and the creditor cannot hold the estate,⁴⁷ nor,

Separation of devise from business trust

Where testator devised farm to daughter and created business trust to carry on quarry business, under terms of will devise was definitely separated from business trust, and farm could not be made subject to claims arising from operation of the quarry business under the will, and devisee of farm or successors were not estopped from asserting that farm was not subject to business debts arising after testator's death from operation of business trust, by reason of fact that devisee knew of continuance of quarry business and expected profits therefrom, since devisee said or did nothing to induce executors to proceed with business, or by reason of fact that taxes on farm were paid by executors, since such taxes could be recovered from devisee's executor.—Hewitt v. as shown infra § 238, can the representative look to the estate for reimbursement.

Where the business has been carried on without any authorization of law, heirs who joined therein, although acting in the best of faith, will be charged with knowledge of the want of capacity of the administrator, and cannot thereafter assert their claims for contributions of money or services, either against the general assets of the estate, in preference to the claims of original creditors, or against the assets thus embarked in the business, in the absence of a showing that the business was conducted at a profit and that the services rendered and the money advanced inured to the benefit of that part of the estate so embarked in the business.⁴⁸ However, where an administrator continues the business in good faith, at a profit, a subsequent administrator de bonis non will not be permitted to deny the validity of claims presented by sons and heirs of decedent on account of services rendered and money advanced in connection with the business, and which resulted in increasing that part of the estate.⁴⁹

§ 197. Partnership

The personal representative of a deceased partner has no right to continue in the partnership business unless authorized to do so by will or partnership contract.

Ordinarily, as shown in the C.J.S. title Partnership § 337, also 47 C.J. p 1111 note 66, the death of a partner terminates the partnership, and the personal representative of decedent has, as a rule, no more right to continue in a business in which decedent was a partner than he has to continue a business of which decedent was the sole proprietor.⁵⁰ The executor of deceased copartner may, however, continue in the business where the will directs him to do so;⁵¹ or, as shown in the C.J.S. title Partnership § 294, also 47 C.J. p 1069 note 94—p 1070 note 16, the liability of deceased copartner, as well as his interest in the profits of the concern, may by the copartnership contract be continued beyond his death. The effect of such a contract must naturally be to bind the estate of deceased partner in the hands of his executor or administrator without compelling such representative to become a partner personally.⁵² Where there are no valid provisions by will or contract for further continuing a partnership, either the surviving partner or partners, or else, if necessary the personal representative of decedent, should see that the business is duly wound up and adjusted.⁵³ A settlement of partnership affairs made with the surviving partners by the personal representative of deceased partner is binding on the latter's estate, its creditors and beneficiaries, except in cases of fraud or mistake, and for only the share thus received is the representative presumably liable.⁵⁴

Div. 480, motion denied 161 N.E. 189, 247 N.Y. 577.

Statutory provision for accounting

The purpose of the statute relating to accounting by a surviving partner with executor or administrator of deceased partner in probate proceeding was to secure an orderly settlement of partnership affairs with respect to insuring an accounting with all the heirs entitled thereto and with respect to the rights of the creditors of the estate. The statute has no application after a final decree of distribution in the estate of deceased partner, when the remedy is by an appropriate proceeding in equity.—State ex rel. Reiridon v. executor or administrator to engage in business with the funds of the estate.⁵⁶ Where the executor of deceased partner in a banking business allowed testator's capital to remain in the business, and permitted credits to be entered in his pass book as executor for a share of the profits of the business, this was held not to render him personally liable as a partner.⁵⁷

C. CONTRACTS IN GENERAL

§ 198. In General

Subject to certain exceptions, as a general rule contracts of an executor or administrator, although made for the benefit of the estate, are, if made on an independent consideration moving between the promisee and the representative as promisor, the personal contracts of the representative and do not bind the estate.

It is well settled as a general rule that the contracts of an executor or administrator, although made in the interest and for the benefit of the estate he represents, are, if made on a new and independent consideration moving between the promisee and the representative as promisor, the personal contracts of the executor or administrator and do not bind the estate.⁵⁸ Hence, the executor or admin-

contracts are subject to such legal limitations.⁶⁵

The general rule is subject to exceptions,⁶⁶ and the estate may be held liable for promises made by the administrator where in law he has the right to make such promises, or where in law it is his duty without a promise to do just what he has promised to do.⁶⁷ So debts incurred for the incidental charges of the due course of administration have been held obligatory on the estate,⁶⁸ and an executor may sometimes create debts against the estate for expenses incurred in complying with the directions of the will,⁶⁹ and the necessities of the case may sometimes be such as to permit of the representative binding the estate by his contract made for its benefit,⁷⁰ or he may sometimes bind the estate by his contract made with the sanction of the probate court.⁷¹ Power may also be given to an executor by the will to bind the estate by contract,⁷² and statutes sometimes give to the representative certain powers in this respect,⁷³ but it has been held that, even though executors and testamentary trustees are authorized by the will to make repairs on buildings devised to them in trust, they are not liable in their representative capacity on a contract for such repairs,⁷⁴ and an authorization in the will to the executors to do all that the testator might do personally does not authorize their making any addition to a debt due by the estate.⁷⁵

Debtors who bought goods from the administrator and obtained the benefit of their contracts with him cannot question the validity thereof.⁷⁶

§ 199. Services

Subject to certain exceptions, the personal representative and not the estate is directly liable to one, such as an attorney, employed by him to perform services.

The personal representative and not the estate is as a rule directly liable to one whom he employs incidentally in the discharge of his trust, as for selling, custody of, or suitable work on the assets, or clerical or other services in managing the property and the like.⁷⁷

Broker's commission

(1) Prior to the enactment of the statute, an executor or administrator could not bind the estate by a contract for a broker's commission on the sale of real property.—In re Mitchell's Estate, Cal., 123 P.2d 503—24 C.J. p 66 note 21 [e].

(2) Under the statute authorizing the personal representative to bind the estate by such contract, the fact that the contract does not expressly provide for a commission and that such commission should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale does not preclude recovery thereof, the statute being mandatory only in so far as it imposes a limitation on the source of the payment of the commission.—In re Mitchell's Estate, supra.

Contra Wilson v. Fleming, 289 P. 658, 106 Cal.App. 542.

(3) Procuring of purchaser, to whom sale was confirmed without execution of deed and mortgage, was

Where, however, services are rendered under an employment or agreement by which the person rendering them has confined himself to the estate or the personal representative administering it as his debtor, he will not be at liberty afterward to resort to the personal representative individually;⁷⁸ and it has been held that under a statute authorizing an administrator to carry on the business, and under an order expressly authorizing a temporary administrator to conduct a mercantile business by buying and selling merchandise so that the stock should not deteriorate, the administrator had authority to employ an agent to purchase goods for the business, and to bind the estate for compensation for the agent.⁷⁹ Further, the estate may be liable where the representative is insolvent,⁸⁰ or has removed from the jurisdiction,⁸¹ or the claim is for the care of live stock.⁸² A personal representative is not liable personally for services rendered to the estate without his consent,⁸³ and the estate cannot be charged therefor de bonis testatoris.⁸⁴ Where services have been performed without the executor's assent, before his appointment, and under a contract with another executor named in the will, or with a special administrator, the executor is not liable either personally or in his representative capacity.⁸⁵

The estate may be liable under contracts of the executor which he was authorized by the will to make.⁸⁶ Where the will imposed a legal obligation on executors to employ a named person in their conduct of testator's business, it was not requisite to liability of the estate that the executors should make a new contract of employment with such person.⁸⁷

Services of attorney. The rule that debts contracted by the personal representative are obligatory on him as individual obligations and do not primarily bind the estate applies to the fees of attorneys and counsel employed by him in the course of administration. The executor or administrator makes himself personally liable to such attorney or counsel,⁸⁸ and, as shown infra § 223, reimburses not "actual sale" entitling broker to commission.—Wilson v. Fleming, supra.

(4) Until court exercises discretion as to terms of sale by executrices, and amount payable before deed passes, there is no "actual sale" entitling broker to commission.—Wilson v. Fleming, supra.

(5) Broker attacking order providing for payment of commission on contingency could not recover without having commission fixed by court.—Wilson v. Fleming, supra.

(6) Court, in considering benefit to estate from sale by executrices, must consider any commissions to be paid.—Wilson v. Fleming, supra.

(7) Alleged fraud of executrices, resulting in proper order as to payment of commissions to broker, did not harm broker.—Wilson v. Fleming, supra.

(8) Where administratrix signed brokerage contract individually and not as administratrix, but signed receipt on purchaser's deposit in her capacity as administratrix, she was not personally liable to brokers for commission on court's refusal to approve sale, not having waived protection of statute.—Caine v. Polkinghorn, 201 P. 936, 54 Cal.App. 387.

Duty to ascertain authority

Real estate agent employed by executors to sell deceased's realty, with knowledge that he was dealing with deceased's representatives, had duty of ascertaining authority of executors to dispose of decedent's realty, and letter written by executors' attorneys authorizing real estate agent to sell land was insufficient evidence of agency to bind estate, in absence of proof of executors' authority.—Harris v. Cabarrus Bank & Trust Co., 172 S.E. 325, 205 N.C. 526.

Ratification by representative of act of third person

Defendant B authorized plaintiff stockbrokers to sell certain stock owned by an estate, of which B was not an executor. B was without authority to make such contract. This transaction was not known to the executors, who had not procured requisite authority from the court to sell the stock. Plaintiffs sold the stock and demanded it from B, who then communicated with another defendant, who was one of the executors, and she authorized him to tell plaintiffs that their attorney said he would obtain an order of court for transfer of the stock; but this was not done. It was held that such action by the executrix did not bind her personally, nor was it a ratification by the executors, especially in view of the statute which requires concurrence of a majority of executors to bind the estate.—Montague v. Storrow, C.C.A.Wis., 290 F. 912.

himself in his accounts subject to the court's allowance, although it has been said that good faith requires an attorney who intends to hold an executor or administrator personally liable for his fee to inform him of that fact at the time the services of the attorney are sought.⁸⁹

Statutes or local practice come sometimes in aid of an attorney's recovery of recompense or costs by way of allowance out of a particular fund collected, where the suit itself was duly authorized, although this may not necessarily give an attorney the full recompense to which the representative had bound himself personally;⁹⁰ and it seems that the representative may also make a special agreement that the attorney employed to render services beneficial to the estate shall look to the estate alone for recompense.⁹¹ An attorney employed by a personal representative is sometimes allowed compensation directly from the estate where the personal representative is insolvent,⁹² and the statutes sometimes authorize an executor to bind the estate for the payment to attorneys of a reasonable compensation for services which are necessary in the course of administration.⁹³ It has also been held that an executor may bind the estate by the employment of counsel to defend the will when this is contested.⁹⁴

Under a will giving the executor full power to employ persons necessary to manage the estate, an obligation incurred in employing counsel is a charge against the estate, and not a personal charge against the executor.⁹⁵

§ 200. Funeral Expenses, Tombstones, Etc.

An executor or administrator who has ordered the funeral of, or a tombstone for, his decedent has been held liable therefor in his personal, as distinguished from his representative, capacity.

Generally, funeral expenses, the cost of tombstones, and the like, are, as shown infra §§ 384, 385, charges against the estate, which the representative must pay out of the assets and for which he is liable in his representative capacity. However, the general rule, stated supra § 198, denying the power of the representative to bind the estate by his contracts, has been applied so as to hold the executor or administrator who has ordered the funeral of, or a tombstone for, his decedent liable only personally and not in his representative capacity,⁹⁶ unless he has stipulated against personal liability,⁹⁷ or the circumstances are such as clearly to show that the credit of the estate was accepted and to raise the implication of a promise by the estate to pay.⁹⁸

§ 201. Payment of Decedent's Debts

An executor or administrator may bind the estate, and, under some circumstances, himself, individually, by a promise to pay a debt of decedent.

An executor or administrator may bind the estate by a promise to pay the debt which is a just and clear liability of the estate,¹ and a promise to pay a debt of decedent in consideration of assets is a promise in his representative capacity and will support a judgment de bonis testatoris or de bonis decedentis.² His authority in this respect is limited, however, to the amount of assets in his hands, and he can in no case bind the heir or devisee;³ while with respect to himself, as he is not bound to pay the debts beyond the assets which he receives, he is not presumed to intend binding himself for payments in a more extensive sense, and hence even his unequivocal promise, written or oral, to pay a debt of his decedent, does not make him personally liable therefor unless it is founded on some sufficient consideration other than the existence of the debt.⁴ Nevertheless, in various instances, such as extension, forbearance by the creditor, or a substitution of securities, the executor or administrator may make himself personally liable by his direct promise to pay, as for a new and sufficient consideration,⁵ and it has been considered that his direct promise may bind him absolutely if the debt of the decedent was already barred by limitations.⁶

§ 202. Borrowing Money

An executor or administrator, as such, has no inherent authority to borrow money; and loans to the representative which are not authorized by statute, will, or order of court do not bind the estate.

An executor or administrator, as such, has no inherent authority to borrow money, and loans to the representative do not constitute valid claims against the estate or entitle the lender to interest thereon, although the representative may make himself personally liable;⁷ and the rule in this respect is not changed by the fact that the money was borrowed for the benefit of the estate,⁸ although under such circumstances, as shown in the C.J.S. title Subroga-

Acts binding on estate

In so far as the acts of executors and trustees, in substituting their obligations for those of the testator and in borrowing money to meet testator's obligations and their own given in substitution for his, had for their purpose the canceling of testator's indebtedness, they were tion § 10, also-24 C.J. p 71-note 70, there may be a right of subrogation.

It has been said that the probate court is without power to confer on the personal representative the authority to borrow;⁹ nevertheless, the exercise of such power has been upheld¹⁰ where the money was borrowed for the purpose of paying debts of decedent.¹¹

Power to borrow money on lien security may be given by will,¹² and statutes sometimes sanction borrowing with the creation of a lien, although usually on due investigation and a previous order from the court.¹³ Furthermore, it has been held that the power may be conferred by stipulation of the interested parties.¹⁴

Where a loan was made under circumstances rendering the estate liable therefor, the lender is not required, as a condition of preserving his rights against the estate, to see to the application of the money lent.¹⁵

Ex parte order

A probate court has no power to make ex parte order authorizing executor to borrow money.—Brownfield v. McFadden, 68 P.2d 993, 21 Cal. App.2d 208.

In New York the court will not direct executors concerning the borrowing of money and the pledging of the estate's securities, as the arrangement for a final settlement is a matter entirely invested in executors.—In re Schmutz' Estate, 288 N.Y.S. 98, 159 Misc. 454.—In re Hanna's Estate, 196 N.Y.S. 160, 119 Misc. 285.

Whether order of probate court, approving loan for payment of testator's debts, was subject to collateral attack by devisee, depended on whether probate court had power to hear and determine validity of claim for payment of which loan was obtained, since, if claim was utterly void, court had no power to hear and determine its validity, and order was void and subject to collateral attack, but, if court had right of decision, then order, although erroneous, was not void and not subject to collateral attack.—Dallas Joint Stock Land Bank of Dallas v. Forsyth, supra.

Power to authorize renewal or extension

The probate court had power to authorize renewal or extension of indebtedness of estates by administrators or executors pursuant to court orders by borrowing money to pay indebtedness which was due, even prior to enactment of statute providing that an executor or administrator may on application and order, authorizing such, renew or extend any obligation owing by or owing to estate.—*Loewenstein v. § 203. Bills and Notes

An executor or administrator is without inherent authority to impose liability on the estate by giving or indorsing a note or accepting a bill of exchange.

An executor or administrator has no inherent authority to render the estate liable by giving or indorsing a promissory note or accepting a bill of exchange,¹⁷ nor is such authority deducible from an express power to sell and reinvest the assets;¹⁸ but the executor or administrator is personally liable on such an instrument, as maker, indorser, or acceptor, as the case may be,¹⁹ unless it is expressly stipulated that he shall not be individually liable,²⁰ or unless he is able to show that, as his individual contract, the note was without consideration, and the payee agreed to look only to the estate for payment.²¹

It is usually considered that the rule imposing personal liability on the representative is not affected by the fact that the note or acceptance is given for a debt of decedent,²² or for money borrowed for the estate,²³ or that the note is given as a renewal of a note executed by decedent.²⁴ It has been held that the personal liability of the representative is not affected by the fact that he signs as "executor" or "administrator"²⁵ and designates by name the es-

It has been held that the probate court is without power to confer authority on the representative to execute bills or notes.³³ Statutes sometimes permit of borrowing on note, usually with the assent of the probate court,³⁴ and on a note executed under such circumstances the representative is not personally liable.³⁵ Power to bind the estate by giving a note may be conferred also by the terms of the will.³⁶

§ 205. Right or Duty to Invest

Unless directed or authorized by statute, or by the will or the necessities of the case, an executor or administrator ordinarily is under no duty and possesses no right to invest funds belonging to the estate.

Although it has been said that an executor or administrator owes the duty, pending distribution, to use usual prudent means to make the estate productive of income,⁴⁰ as a general rule, the duty of an executor or administrator is confined to collecting and paying out or distributing the assets of the es-

Exchange of stock

The executor under will directing it as trustee to keep trust estate tended administration;⁴⁸ and the reason for such power in an executor or administrator is even stronger where the situation is more that of a change in securities for the protection of the estate than of an investment.⁴⁹

§ 206. Duties and Liabilities with Respect to Investments

In making investments of the funds of the estate, the representative acts as a trustee, and his duties and liabilities are governed by the same rules as apply to other trustees.

In making investments of the funds of the estate, invested, and giving it power to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of property, had authority to exchange bank stock comprising a portion of estate for stock in new bank formed as result of a consolidation.—Glass v. Crossman, 286 N.W. 184, 289 Mich. 180.

"Securities"

Where testatrix authorized executors to reinvest in such "securities" as they might deem advisable, although not legal investments under statute, word "securities" would be deemed to include stock, both preferred and common.—Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. Lowy, 196 A. 369, 123 N.J.Eq. 90.

"Desire" of testator

A recital that it was testator's "desire" that all moneys derived from his estate should be invested in certain securities was an expression of a desire, and authorized investment in such securities, but was not mandatory.—In re Scott's Will, 204 N.Y.S. 478.

Time for reinvestment

the representative acts as trustee rather than as executor or administrator,⁵⁰ and his duties and liabilities with respect to such investments are governed by the same rules as apply to other trustees.⁵¹ If the will contains directions as to the investments to be made these must be followed,⁵² but the executor has a reasonable time in which to make the investment.⁵³ In the absence of express contrary authorization in the will, the funds of the estate may be placed only in securities which diligent and prudent men of discretion would purchase,⁵⁴ and which, in addition, are authorized for trust investment by the pertinent statutes of the state.⁵⁵ Furthermore,

Protection of investment

Executor and administratrix holding guaranteed mortgage certificates were permitted to protect investments by agreeing with issuing companies, financially embarrassed, to reduction of interest and extension of time and to release guarantor from guaranty to pay certificates in full, the agreement to contain provision that release should be void on appointment of receiver, or on taking over of guarantors by superintendent of insurance.—In re Cameron's Estate, 265 N.Y.S. 328, 147 Misc. 424.

Particular wills construed

(1) A will authorizing investment of moneys derived from estate, stating testator's preference to be South American states and countries and cities, "and last the laws of the state of New York," was clearly intended to mean investments authorized by laws of the state of New York.—In re Scott's Will, 204 N.Y.S. 478.

(2) A clause in will prohibiting executors from investing in securities in which named trust company or its affiliates were interested did not prohibit executors from purchasing securities merely because named trust company or its affiliates held, or were transfer agents or registrars for, similar securities.—In re Herb's Estate, 296 N.Y.S. 491, 163 Misc. 441.

Right to compel compliance with will

When executor violated testator's instructions by changing investment without cause from deposit in bank designated by testator to deposit in another bank, such violation gave beneficiaries right in equity without waiting for actual loss to compel executor to make investment in accordance with instructions of testator.—*Etna Casualty & Surety Co. of Hartford, Conn. v. Validity of order

Where testator devised estate to adopted son and five brothers, son disappeared and executor was appointed trustee for the son, and judgment creditor of son levied on son's interest in the estate, whereupon executor obtained order authorizing investment of estate's funds for purchase of son's interest at execution sale, order was not void as exceeding court's jurisdiction, since court has general authority to order funds to be invested; and executor could not claim order was void on ground that no notice of hearing of the petition had been given, since the executor's notice as such and individually sufficed as notice in his capacity as trustee. Any objection to the particular manner of exercising the court's power must be taken advantage of by direct appeal and not by collateral attack.—In re Pierce's Estate, 81 P.2d 1037, 28 Cal.App.2d 8.

(1) Even though a will created a trust by providing that executor was

Investments in property in another state. The investments of an executor or administrator usually should be limited to property or securities located in the state in which he is appointed,⁶⁴ but he is not absolutely prohibited from investing in property in another state.⁶⁵

§ 207. Liability for Investing without Authority

An executor or administrator is liable for all losses resulting from unauthorized or improper investments of estate funds, and if any profit results, it belongs, at the election of those interested, to the estate. Legatees may be estopped to assert liability against the representative.

An executor or administrator is liable for all losses resulting from unauthorized or improper investments of estate funds,⁶⁶ although he cannot be compelled to refund the entire fund expended as long as the securities purchased have any value.⁶⁷ If any unauthorized or improper investment or use of the funds of the estate results in a profit, such profit belongs, at the election of those interested, to the estate.⁶⁸ The beneficiaries may elect to charge the defrauded by representations that it was a first mortgage, it was said that an executrix, ordinarily, is not responsible for poor investments, if made in good faith and honest belief in their value.—Federal Land Bank of Springfield, Mass. v. Young, 133 A. 537, 99 N.J.Eq. 607.

(3) However, where a testator vested his executors with power to invest in improved and productive real estate or in sound productive securities as they might deem best, the executors were not exonerated on investing money in stocks which depreciated and thereby caused a loss to the estate, as the authority conferred did not merely bind them to the exercise of good faith and reasonable judgment.—Brown v. Brown, 65 A. 739, 72 N.J.Eq. 667.

Retention of funds

Without a specific approval by the court, the retention by an administrator, for his own use, of funds set aside to secure payment of annuities could not be treated as an investment of the funds which would relieve the administrator from liability therefor as such.—*Ellyson v. An executor or administrator who, without authority, lends money belonging to the estate, does so at his own risk, and is personally liable for any resulting loss.

Loans made under due authority as an investment are discussed supra §§ 205, 206. Aside from such loans, an executor or administrator who lends to other persons the money or assets in his hands does so at his own individual risk and may be held personally liable as for conversion or to make good a resulting loss.⁷³ However, it has been held that the executor or administrator may in a proper case lend or advance to a distributee on the security of his interest,⁷⁴ or in the exercise of due prudence lend to a failing debtor of the estate for the sake of getting security which could not be otherwise obtained.⁷⁵ Further, it has been held that the representative may, for the purpose of preserving the value of the estate, lend to a company in which the estate holds stock,⁷⁶ although it has been held that the probate court has no power to authorize such a loan,⁷⁷ and that a loan of this character is, in the absence of a testamentary provision, unauthorized,⁷⁸ even though made by the executor in good faith and in an effort to follow decedent's wishes.⁷⁹

Although the borrower, where the loan was unauthorized, will not be treated as a trustee in invitum, and held to an accounting at the instance of the cestui que trust,⁸⁰ any impropriety in the making of a loan by an executor or administrator cannot relieve the borrower of his obligations to the lender with respect to the loan,⁸¹ and for whatever the representative may receive from the borrower he is duly accountable to the estate,⁸² and entitled to credit accordingly.⁸³ Where all parties are chargeable with knowledge of the illegality of unsecured loans, the loans must be repaid or secured.⁸⁴ Where a testator before his death was a special partner of a certain person and by his will directed his executors to allow such person to retain as a loan to him the amount contributed by testator to the capital of the firm, such person could not be compelled to give security for the loan.⁸⁵

E. INTEREST ON FUNDS OF ESTATE

§ 209. In General

In the absence of statute or special circumstances, a personal representative ordinarily is chargeable with interest only if he has received it.

At one time executors and administrators were not chargeable in any event with interest on the funds of the estate in their hands,⁸⁶ but this rule has long since been abrogated, and it is now well settled that such charge may be made.⁸⁷ Interest is not usually chargeable as a matter of course,⁸⁸ but may be charged if the circumstances of the particular case require it,⁸⁹ the matter being within the discretion of the court.⁹⁰

On general principles the personal representative is bound to render an account of all interest or profit actually received by him out of the assets of the estate.⁹¹ However, except as statutes may otherwise prescribe,⁹² where no interest was actually received by the representative, he is not chargeable with interest unless there are special circumstances to warrant such a charge,⁹³ which circumstances are considered infra §§ 210-215.

Where an executor had possession of the bonds of a certain corporation and accounted for interest thereon up to a certain date only,

§ 210. Propriety of Charge as Affected by Particular Circumstances

A personal representative will be held liable for interest only where it would be equitable to do so.

An executor or administrator will not be charged with interest if it would be inequitable to do so under the circumstances.⁹⁴ Whether the executor has profited by his transactions is a matter to be taken into consideration.⁹⁵

An improper charge of interest on a specific item cannot be justified by showing that interest might have been chargeable on some other items.⁹⁶

§ 211. — Failure to Invest or Deposit

The court in its discretion may charge an executor or administrator with interest if he has kept the estate funds idle when with due diligence he could have made them income producing.

gence, may be charged with interest thereon,⁹⁷ especially if he has been wanting in good faith⁹⁸ or has failed to comply with an order of the court directing such investment.⁹⁹

However, there is no inflexible rule requiring such a charge,¹ and in cases where the executor or administrator has not actually received interest or used the funds of the estate for his own purposes, and has merely permitted them to lie idle when they might have been productively employed for the benefit of the estate, it is a matter of discretion with the court, on consideration of all the circumstances of the case, whether interest shall be charged.² The important question is whether he has exercised good faith and due diligence as custodian of the particular fund;³ and in the absence of any governing statute, the courts are not inclined to charge a personal representative whose conduct has been honest and not unreasonable, and who has made no personal use of the fund, where the circumstances justified him in not actively investing or placing it at interest, and even where he was merely inert in failing to do so.⁴

A reasonable period is sometimes allowed within which to invest; and no interest is chargeable for failure to invest during such period,⁵ but at the expiration thereof liability becomes fixed,⁶ unless the representative shows a good excuse for further delay.⁷

§ 212. — Improper Use of Funds

An executor or administrator who wrongfully appropriates or commingles estate funds may be charged interest thereon. Such a charge may be proper against a financial institution which, acting as a representative, places estate funds in its own depository.

who appropriates money of the estate to his own use is properly charged with interest thereon;⁸ and the imposition of such a charge is mandatory under some statutory provisions.⁹ The general rule is especially applicable where the representative has actually received interest on the moneys of the estate used by him, and in such case he is chargeable at least to the extent of the amount earned;¹⁰ but it is not essential to the representative's liability for interest that he should have derived any benefit from the use of the funds,¹¹ nor is his liability affected by the fact that he was at all times able¹² and ready¹³ to pay over the money if demanded.

An executor or administrator is not accountable for interest where any possible benefit derived from the use of the funds is wholly indirect and incidental,¹⁴ or where the particular use is authorized by statute;¹⁵ the representative is not liable for interest where in good faith and, as a matter of convenience, he takes title to some of the estate assets in his own name individually.¹⁶

Commingling of funds. Mingling trust moneys with those which the fiduciary owns as an individual is usually regarded as so reprehensible that the executor or administrator who blends the funds of the estate with his own or uses the same in his business is chargeable with interest during the whole time of such mingling and indiscriminate use,¹⁷ even though the will postponed the time of distribution of the estate and did not direct an investment of the funds meanwhile,¹⁸ or the use was during a protracted litigation as to the right to the funds,¹⁹ or it is not shown that he was actuated by any wrongful intent.²⁰ Nevertheless, it has been held that the mere fact of mingling estate funds, without any use being made thereof, does not justify charging the personal representative with interest.²¹

Representative interested in depositary. A personal representative is not ordinarily chargeable with interest on estate funds merely because they were deposited in a bank of which he was a stockholder or officer, or in which he was otherwise financially interested.²² Nevertheless, there may be circumstances which will warrant a charge of interest on moneys so deposited.²³

Where a bank or trust company, which is acting as representative of an estate, deposits estate funds with itself and lends them out at interest in the same manner as other deposits, it is properly charged with interest.²⁴ However, it has been held that where the executor is a bank, a mere routine deposit of the estate moneys in its own bank is not such a use as to render it liable for interest,²⁵ at least in the absence of negligence or insolvency of the bank, or the use of the funds to provide a necessary cash reserve, or other facts of a similar nature.²⁶

Proof of use of funds. A mere suspicion that the representative has used funds of the estate is not sufficient to justify a charge of interest against him;²⁷ but it is sufficient if there is strong presumptive evidence of such use,²⁸ if such use can reasonably be inferred from the facts,²⁹ or if a claim that the money was so used is not denied.³⁰ Of course there can be no charge of interest against the personal representative where the proof shows that his use of the estate funds was not in fact improper.³¹

§ 213. — Delay in Settling Estate

An unreasonable delay in settling the estate or a delay which extends beyond the period prescribed by statute, may render the representative liable for interest.

The mere fact of delay in closing up an estate does not of itself justify a charge of interest against the personal representative.³³ The representative should not be charged with interest not actually received where the delay was not unreasonable under the circumstances of the case,³⁴ or was not due to any culpable neglect or misconduct on his part, but was otherwise occasioned, as by some needful judicial preliminaries, the sickness or absence of the judge, litigation, or interference among rival claimants to the fund, the nonascertainment of those actually entitled, the fact that the person entitled could not be found, or similar causes, and he has not used or made any profit on the funds in his hands.³⁵ However, where there has been long and culpable delay by the representative in accounting or in settling the estate and distributing the residue, interest is chargeable³⁶ after a reasonable time has elapsed,³⁷ and a demand for settlement is not essential to render him liable.³⁸

What constitutes unreasonable delay so as to render the personal representative liable for interest depends on the facts and circumstances,³⁹ such as the conditions existing during the time allowed for settling the estate.⁴⁰

The representative is not chargeable with interest for delay occasioned by the failure of the distributees or legatees to call for moneys retained by him,⁴¹ although he is liable if he has had the money in his hands for a long time and has not kept it ready for distribution.⁴²

Period prescribed by statute. A definite time is allowed in some jurisdictions for the settlement of estates, and within this time an executor or administrator is not generally chargeable with interest, unless he has actually made it, or has used the money for his own purposes,⁴³ or unless there was no necessity for retaining the fund for the entire period,⁴⁴ as, for example, where the estate was settled during the period and nothing remained for the personal representative to do except to pay out the money.⁴⁵ However, after the lapse of such period he is liable, at least prima facie, for interest on all moneys which are or should be in his hands,⁴⁶ and can relieve himself only by showing an application of the money to the exigencies of the estate.⁴⁷

During settlement of accounts. If no negligence or improper conduct is imputable to the executor or administrator, interest will not be charged for the time that the account is before the accounting officer in process of settlement,⁴⁸ or while exceptions to the account are pending;⁴⁹ but if the exceptions are pending for a long time, and the executor or administrator allows the funds to remain unproductive without asking the advice of the court, he should be charged with interest during such time.⁵⁰

Delay in paying debts. The personal representative is chargeable with interest paid by him on an obligation of the estate where he improperly delays in paying off the indebtedness although having sufficient moneys on hand with which to do so.⁵¹

§ 214. — Reservation for Contingencies

The personal representative may keep a reasonable sum on hand to meet contingencies, without becoming liable for interest, although if the retention of such funds appears unnecessary he should apply to the court for instructions.

An executor or administrator is not liable to pay interest on a reasonable sum retained in his hands or on deposit to meet expenses and pay judgments recovered against the estate, or to abide the contingencies of some litigation concerning the assets and the title of parties claimant;⁵² but it must appear that the funds were actually kept in hand for the purposes in question.⁵³

In case the representative finds himself with funds not needed for the purposes mentioned, he should, to avoid liability for interest, report that fact to the court and apply for an order of distribution or for leave to pay the money into court, or for instructions in the premises,⁵⁴ and circumstances may arise where, not having procured the protection of the probate court, he may make himself chargeable for interest which the fund would fairly have earned had he dealt prudently with the assets.⁵⁵

The necessity for keeping funds on hand must in any case be determined on consideration of the particular facts involved,⁵⁶ and the burden of proving the necessity of so retaining them is on the representative.⁵⁷

Unreasonable amount

If the representative keeps on hand more than is reasonably sufficient for current purposes, he is chargeable with interest on the excess.—Frost v. Denman, 2 A. 926, 41 N.J. Eq. 47—24 C.J. p 82 note 30 [e].

Good faith

(1) Where the executor acted in good faith his liability may be limited to the amount lost without interest.—Wyckoff v. Van Siclen, 3 Dem.Surr., N.Y., 75.

(2) Where the executor had no money of the estate, and was compelled to borrow at times to meet the expenses of administration, he should not be held to pay interest on amounts charged to him by reason of his neglecting to collect assets, if he acted honestly and in good faith, and it is not shown that the assets would have realized any interest had he collected them.—In re Hall, 41 A. 508, 70 Vt. 453.

funds wrongfully lost through his improper investments, disbursements, failure to collect debts, or the like.

It is generally held that if funds of the estate are lost through the fault of the executor or administrator, either by failure to collect debts or by improper disbursements or investments, he is chargeable with interest on the amount lost, as well as with the principal sum;⁵⁸ but the rule is not absolute, and in a number of cases it has been held that interest is not chargeable on funds which have been lost by the executor or administrator.⁵⁹

Failure to collect interest. An executor or administrator is chargeable with interest accruing to the estate which should have been collected by him, but which he failed to collect,⁶⁰ unless it is made to appear that the interest could not have been collected by the use of reasonable diligence.⁶¹

b. Personal Debts and Claims of Representative

An executor or administrator may be required to pay interest on debts owed by him to the estate, on funds withheld by him under an improper claim, and on commissions which he has prematurely withdrawn.

An executor or administrator who is indebted to the estate is chargeable with interest on his indebtedness.⁶²

A retention of funds which the personal representative owns in his individual capacity,⁶³ or as to

Estate indebted to representative

Where an executor has a valid claim against the estate for an amount in excess of his indebtedness, it is error to charge him with interest on his debt without allowing him interest on his claim.—In re Sutton, 49 A. 775, 200 Pa. 158.

which he asserts a fair claim of right,⁶⁴ will not render him liable for interest. However, it has been held proper to charge a personal representative with interest on the amount of a claim improperly paid to himself,⁶⁵ or retained by him under a claim which has no substantial basis and which is subsequently decided against him.⁶⁶

Premature withdrawal of commissions. It has been held that, where the representative withdraws money from the estate for his commissions before settlement or the due allowance of commissions, he is chargeable with interest thereon,⁶⁷ although he acted in good faith and under advice of counsel,⁶⁸ but there is also authority for the view that interest should not be charged on commissions prematurely withdrawn,⁶⁹ at least where the action of the representative in this respect was authorized or consented to by the persons beneficially interested in the estate.⁷⁰

c. Estoppel, Waiver, and Laches

The right to have a representative charged with interest may be lost by estoppel, waiver, or laches on the part of the persons interested in the estate.

A claim for interest based on an improper act or omission of the personal representative may be barred by laches or estoppel,⁷¹ or may be waived.⁷² Heirs have been held not estopped to claim interest on funds used by the executor by their failure to make such claim until after the final settlement,⁷³ nor by the fact that without full knowledge of the circumstances they signed receipts in full for their shares.⁷⁴

d. Miscellaneous Circumstances

Interest may be charged against a representative guilty of misconduct; and it may also be charged on moneys not properly accounted for, or representing a balance due the estate. Various circumstances in addition to those discussed in prior sections have been held not to warrant a charge of interest against an executor or administrator.

In addition to the circumstances discussed supra this section and §§ 210-214, interest may be charged against a personal representative by reason of other circumstances.⁷⁵ Misconduct of a representative may warrant charging him with interest.⁷⁶ It has also been held proper to charge the representative with interest on moneys received by him but not accounted for,⁷⁷ on the balance found to be due the estate on a settlement,⁷⁸ on money improperly withdrawn from the estate for payment over to a third

In addition to the circumstances treated supra this section and §§ 210-214, various other circumstances have been held not to warrant a charge of interest against a personal representative.⁸³ Interest should not be charged against a representative who manages the estate honestly and well for mere neglect to render an account;⁸⁴ he should not be charged absolutely for interest on money in his hands, if it is in dispute to whom he should pay it, and no negligence or bad faith is to be imputed to him;⁸⁵ and no interest should be charged on small balances where neither default in payment nor misconduct appears,⁸⁶ or on funds withdrawn from a bank in good faith although without a prior order of the court.⁸⁷

Interest is not chargeable on sums paid for counsel fees prior to their allowance if the amount paid is subsequently approved by the court;⁸⁸ and it has also been held that no interest should be charged on counsel fees improperly paid by the executor, and for which he is refused credit in his account, where the payment was made in good faith.⁸⁹

Interest should not be charged on collections of trifling amount as compared with anticipated outlay,⁹⁰ nor should unearned interest be charged on a distribution earlier than the regular time.⁹¹

§ 216. Rate, Time, and Computation of Interest

- a. Rate
- b. Time
- c. Computation

a. Rate

The rate of interest for which a personal representative is liable depends on the amount which the estate funds earned or should have earned. The legal rate or the interest rate paid by banks is frequently considered proper.

In general the personal representative, if liable for interest, is liable simply for the current interest that may be fairly obtained, or else for the interest he has actually made;⁹² but the circumstances of each

83. Order of payment of debts

Where two debts of the estate bear interest at different rates and the personal representative first pays off the debt bearing the lower interest rate, he is not chargeable with the difference in interest lost to the estate if the surrounding circumstances show that he has exercised reasonable business judgment as to the order of payment.—In re Barreiro's Estate, 13 P.2d 1017, 125 Cal.App. 153.

Income applied to beneficiary's use

Dividends

Executors who bought stock on recommendation of reputable bankers and brokers were required to account only to extent of interest received by way of dividends and not for legal interest.—King v. Kitchen's Ex'rs, 118 S.W.2d 144, 274 Ky. 157.

Debt to estate

case should be considered in determining the rate to be charged,⁹² the matter being one which rests in the discretion of the court.⁹⁴ It is frequently regarded as proper to charge the representative with the legal rate of interest⁹⁵ or the rate allowed by banks on interest-bearing accounts.⁹⁶

Where the representative has merely neglected to make the fund productive, the court may not visit him with a heavy penalty, while if he has used the money for his own purposes, or has otherwise mis-conducted himself in the use of it, a higher rate of interest may be imposed.⁹⁷ Indeed in some states the rate in case of misconduct is fixed so high as to amount practically to a penalty.⁹⁸ A statute which provides a minimum rate of interest payable on trust funds does not prevent a higher rate being charged against a trust company acting as an executor.⁹⁹

(1) Time from Which Interest Runs

The time from which a personal representative will be charged with interest depends on the circumstances.

The time from which an executor or administrator will be charged with interest must depend to a large extent on the circumstances of the particular case.¹ A reasonable time to collect and apply money or to render accounts should be allowed before interest is charged,² and interest should not, as a rule, be required from the representative before he actually receives the fund,³ unless interest comes to his hands.⁴ Where the representative is ordered to pay over certain moneys, interest runs from the date specified in the order.⁵

A representative who has improperly withdrawn funds from the estate or has applied estate funds to his own use and profit, may be charged with interest from the time he withdrew or received the funds⁶ or even from the time of decedent's death.⁷ A representative who has transferred estate moneys from an interest-bearing deposit to a noninterest-bearing one, may be charged from the date of the change.⁸ A charge of interest from the time of the receipt of a fund is sometimes proper, particularly in cases of neglect or misconduct.⁹

(2) Time to Which Interest Runs

The time to which interest against an executor or administrator is computed depends on the circumstances.

The time to which interest against a personal representative is computed depends on the circumstances.¹⁰ An executor who keeps money of the Date when liability became fixed

Where a representative has failed to prosecute a cause of action within the statutory period, interest on the amount of his liability for such failure is allowable from the date when the right against the representative for breach of duty became fixed.—Wisconsin Trust Co. v. Cousins, 179 N.W. 801, 172 Wis. 486.

Date of report

(1) When a suit for an accounting has been brought and a balance against the executor or administrator is found by the master, interest should be charged on such balance only from the date of the master's report, where it appears that the executor or administrator acted in good faith, but had misapprehended his duty as to the matters with respect to which he was found chargeable.—Norman v. Storer, C.C.N.Y., 18 F.Cas. No.10,301, 1 Blatchf. 593.

(2) It is proper to charge interest from the date of an auditor's report.—Brown v. Parks, 9 S.E.2d 897, 190 Ga. 540.

Where a will is set aside and a bill is thereafter filed against the person who was acting as executor, for an accounting as to the funds in his hands, he is liable for interest, at least from the time when the bill for the accounting was filed.—Wood v. Nelson, 10 B.Mon., Ky., 229.

Testamentary provisions

Under a will giving testator's widow the net income of the estate until his son reached his majority, after which the income should be divided equally between them, the executors are not chargeable with interest on the amount of the principal paid over to the widow before the majority of the son; but after the son's majority they must pay one half of the interest to him.—Matter of Wagner, 117 N.Y.S. 53, 132 App.Div. 306.

Where a representative improperly withdraws funds from the estate, interest runs until repayment of the funds.¹⁴ If the executor or administrator was indebted to decedent, the rule that such debt is to be considered assets in his hands does not operate to stop the running of interest, but he is chargeable with interest until actual payment to the estate.¹⁵ In the case of a personal representative who has made an illegal investment or profit, it has been held proper to charge interest to the date of the filing of his account.¹⁶ Where commissions have been withdrawn in anticipation of their subsequent allowance, interest runs to the date of the allowance.¹⁷

Exceptions to account. The liability of a representative for interest is not necessarily suspended for the period during which exceptions to his accounts are pending.¹⁸

c. Computation

(1) In general

(2) Compound interest

(1) In General

Interest charged against a personal representative is usually computed on the basis of annual balances. Such balances or other principal sum used as the basis of computation must be correctly ascertained.

In computing interest charges against a personal representative it is necessary properly to determine the amount of the principal on which the interest is to be charged.¹⁹ The usual practice is to treat funds received during the current year as unproductive until its close, and to regard all expenditures, including compensation and commissions in the course of the year, as made before the balance is struck, and on the balance so struck to calculate the interest in such way as to avoid compounding it.²⁰ Where the annual balances are too small to have been put at interest, and the executor has received no credit or profit from them, interest will be charged only on the accumulated balances.²¹ In charging an executor or administrator with interest on funds in his hands at a final settlement, his commission or recompense, or if he is a distributee his distributive share, should be deducted before a balance is struck and interest finally computed against him.²²

To time of appraisal of assets

On the settlement of the accounts of an administrator after his death, he was properly charged with the face of a mortgage which he collected, and interest only to the time of the appraisal of the assets of the estate, the presumption being, in the absence of proof, that past-due debts of the estate were promptly collected, so that interest was not chargeable against him after the appraisal.—Knapp v. Income collected

Where the estate consists of income-producing securities or choses in action which the personal representative retains in kind, his liability for interest charges for delay in settling the estate should be based on the income collected by him and not on the corpus of the estate.—Farber's Ex'r v. Farber, 148 S.W.2d 732, 285 Ky. 596.

Where disbursements exceed receipts in a particular year the amount on which the administrator is to be charged interest is determined by adding to the balance in his hands the receipts for that year and deducting from the result the amount of the disbursements during the year.—Hutchison v. Deductions after computing interest

Where an executor's account showed that for more than thirty years there was in his hands a balance for which he should account to the legatee, less the expense of accounting, such expense should be deducted after and not before computing interest.—In re Barclow, 86 N.J.Eq. 611.

should have been placed at interest, either as to their disposition or as to what was actually received, the representative should be charged, as nearly as the sum can be ascertained, with all he might have made or received in the honest exercise of due diligence and exertion, periodical computation being made, less the proper deductions.²³

Where the personal representative has paid interest on the funds used by him, he will be allowed credit to the extent of the amount paid.²⁴ If a financial institution acting as representative has made a profit on estate funds deposited with it, it may deduct from the gross profits so made a proportionate share of its banking expenses, and credit to the estate only the balance.²⁵

(2) Compound Interest

Compound interest is rarely charged against a personal representative unless for willful or gross delinquency, or unless such interest has been received by the representative. If allowed, such interest is usually compounded annually.

If compound interest has been received by the representative he must, of course, account for it;²⁶ but otherwise compound interest is rarely charged against an executor or administrator by way of penalty, unless something more appears than ordinary neglect of duty.²⁷ Where there has been a willful breach of trust, or gross delinquency, or where the representative has mingled the trust funds with his own or used the same for his own benefit, a charge of compound interest may be proper,²⁸ even though the representative was always ready to respond for the funds on demand.²⁹ Delay in accounting for such a period as to amount to gross neglect of duty has been held to justify such a charge against the delinquent executor or administrator,³⁰ and a failure to invest in accordance with the directions of the will for the purpose of accumulation may also authorize a charge of compound interest against the executor.³¹

In settling the account of a deceased personal representative, compound interest will be charged only to the date of his death and simple interest thereafter, irrespective of the length of time during which the account was in process of settlement, if the delay was not due to his management of the estate.³²

In computing compound interest it has been held proper to add to the principal interest which accrued during the time when simple interest only was chargeable, thus forming a new principal on which to start the calculation of compound interest.³³ Ordinarily the computation is made with annual rests,³⁴ but this is a matter to be determined according to the circumstances of each case,³⁵ and if the method of making annual rests is not adequate in any case, as where the amounts are large and easy of investment, rests will be made semi-annually.³⁶

F. EXPENDITURES

1. IN GENERAL

§ 217. Right to Credit for Expenditures in General

- a. In general
- b. Sanction of court

a. In General

A personal representative is entitled to credit in his accounts for expenses necessarily and properly incurred by him in the administration of the estate.

From the very nature of his office, it is the duty of an executor or administrator to pay the legitimate expenses of administration to the extent that the estate is solvent.³⁷ Accordingly, he is authorized to use the funds of the estate for expenditures necessary to its proper administration,³⁸ and is entitled to credit in his accounts for expenses necessarily and properly incurred by him in good faith, in transacting with reasonable care and diligence the business of his trust, on due proof of the particular items of expense claimed.³⁹ The practical situation is usually that the executor or administrator makes himself liable de bonis propriis to others by incurring expense, but that he may reimburse himself under appropriate circumstances out of the assets of the estate.⁴⁰

37. Md.—State, for Use of Czyzowicz, v. Brown, 183 A. 256, 170 Md. 97.

"Administrative expenses" defined

(1) An obligation created by the legal act of the representative in the administration of the estate is an administrative expense.—In re Williams' Estate, 257 N.Y.S. 859, 143 Misc. 527.

(2) In surrogate's court practice, the term "testamentary expenses" connotes the customary disbursements attendant on the ordinary administration of an estate.—In re Walbridge's Will, 9 N.Y.S.2d 907, 170 Misc. 127.

Nature of "administrative expenses"

"Costs attendant upon the administration are debts of the decedent only in the sense of constituting a necessary incident to the post-mortuary disposition of his property."—In re Thurber's Estate, 142 N.E. 493, 494, 311 Ill. 211.

Source of authority to allow

The probate court derives its authority to award costs and expenses to executors and administrators out of the funds of the estate from the statutes, and not from its general probate jurisdiction.—Stover v. Duffee, 189 N.W. 14, 219 Mich. 566.

34 C.J. p 90 note 31.

Contracts of representative as creating personal liability generally see supra § 198.

Theory of payment

(1) In the making of estate disbursements, an executor or administrator, in theory, is deemed to make payment primarily from his own funds, for which, in so far as legally permissible, he will be reimbursed on his accounting.—In re Fewer's Estate, 31 N.Y.S.2d 810, 177 Misc. 788—In re Amico's Estate, 24 N.Y.S.2d 772, 175 Misc. 656—In re Damasky's Estate, 23 N.Y.S.2d 897, 175 Misc. 460.

(2) This theory is not altered by a statute authorizing a fiduciary to pay proper expenses of administration from estate funds, since such statute merely authorizes borrowing by estate fiduciary at his peril, subject to possible future determination that such borrowing constitutes a devastavit.—In re Fewer's Estate, supra.

Borrowing money

Although an executor or administrator borrowing money for the benefit of the estate is bound out of his own property in the first instance, see § 202 supra, he is entitled to be reimbursed out of the assets of the estate where the obligation was honestly and properly incurred for the benefit of the estate.

Giving promissory notes

Although, as shown supra § 203, an executor or administrator giving a promissory note is bound out of his own property in the first instance, he may reimburse himself out of the assets where the consideration was just and beneficial to

Whether or not particular expenditures should be allowed depends largely on the facts in the particular case⁴¹ and is a question of law for the court and not a question of fact for the jury.⁴²

Requisites for allowance. In order to entitle a personal representative to credit in his account for expenses incurred by him, the expenses must have been incurred in good faith,⁴³ with reasonable prudence,⁴⁴ and for the benefit of the estate;⁴⁵ and they must have been reasonably necessary, see § 219 infra, and not the result of the representative's wrongful act, see § 220 infra. No credit will be allowed until the income of the estate has been accounted for⁴⁶ and the amount claimed as an expense has been actually paid, see § 218 infra; and credit will be denied where an allowance thereof would be inequitable and unjust under the facts in the particular case.⁴⁷

Amount of expenditure. A personal representative is entitled to credit in his account for an administration expense only to the extent that it is reasonable in amount,⁴⁸ and what is a reasonable amount in any particular case is a matter resting largely within the discretion of the court.⁴⁹

b. Sanction of Court

51. Cal.—Ludwig v. Superior Court

Although it is not necessary, in order to entitle a personal representative to credit for a proper expenditure, that he should have obtained the approval and sanction of the court before making the expenditure,⁵⁰ it is the better practice to do so.⁵¹

Effect of previous sanction or approval. While a representative is generally entitled to credit for expenditures made by the order of or with the approval and sanction of the court,⁵² even though the court was indiscreet in making the order pursuant to which he acted,⁵³ yet, a mere ex parte order authorizing him to incur expenses is permissive only and tends to show good faith on his part, but does not finally determine the propriety of the expenses;⁵⁴ and the fact that the representative has expended money on the faith of an order of the court making an allowance for certain expenses of course does not preclude the court from annulling such order on evidence that the petition on which it was made did not fully and truly state the facts.⁵⁵

§ 218. Necessity of Actual Payment

As a rule an allowance should not be made to a representative for an administration expense until it has been actually paid.

Credit for an administration expense should not as a rule be allowed to the executor or administrator on his accounting in court, until or unless the

§ 219. Improper or Unnecessary Expenditures

A personal representative will not be allowed credit for improper or unnecessary expenditures made by him.

As a general rule the representative will not be allowed credit for improper or unnecessary payments or expenditures made by him,⁵⁸ especially in the case of needless and extravagant outlays over a small and simple estate,⁵⁹ and although disbursements which ultimately prove to have been unnecessary may be sometimes allowed if made in good faith and under a reasonable belief of their necessity,⁶⁰ the representative must show some just explanation before he can legally claim their allowance.⁶¹

§ 220. Expenses Caused by Misconduct or Unauthorized Acts

A personal representative is not entitled to credit for expenditures necessitated by his own misconduct or wrongful acts.

Positive misconduct on the part of the representative bars any claim by him against the estate for reimbursement of his expenses caused thereby.⁶²

nor will he be allowed credit for expenditures which became necessary by reason of his own negligence⁶³ or which were made in the course of, or resulted from, acts done by him without authority.⁶⁴ Nevertheless, those interested in the estate cannot accept the profits of an improper investment without assuming the incidental outlays.⁶⁵

§ 221. Representative Improperly Appointed

A personal representative, acting in good faith under a voidable order of appointment, is entitled to credit for expenditures properly made in connection with the administration.

An executor or administrator, acting in good faith under a voidable order of appointment, is entitled to credit or reimbursement for expenditures properly made in connection with the administration;⁶⁶ but where the order of appointment is void⁶⁷ or was procured by fraud on the part of the representative⁶⁸ an allowance for expenses will be denied.

§ 223. Counsel Fees and Costs

- a. Counsel fees
- b. Costs and other expenses of litigation

a. Counsel Fees

- (1) In general
- (2) Where representative is an attorney
- (3) Approval of court

(1) In General

Subject to the general requirements of good faith and reasonable prudence, a personal representative may employ an attorney and is entitled to credit in his account or indemnity from the estate for the reasonable charges of counsel for necessary services rendered in good faith for the benefit of the estate.

Subject to the general requirements of good faith and reasonable prudence,⁷¹ an executor or administrator may employ an attorney for advice and assistance with reference to the management of the estate,⁷² the performance of legal services which the representative cannot himself perform,⁷³ and the prosecution or defense of actions or suits on behalf of or against the estate,⁷⁴ and is entitled to credit in his account or indemnity from the estate for the reasonable charges of counsel,⁷⁵ provided the services for which the charge is made were rea-

Statutory requirements must be complied with in order to make charge for attorney's fees allowable and payable out of funds of estate.—Armstrong v. Anderson, Tex.Civ.App., 55 S.W.2d 235.

Allowance not precluded by statute

Rev.Codes 1921 § 9786, does not prevent executors from receiving credit for amount paid for proper attorney's fees, but merely gives proceeding by which attorney, unable to agree with executor as to amount, can have fees fixed, so as to hold estate liable.—In re Connolly's Estate, 235 P. 408, 75 Mont. 35.

To warrant an allowance for counsel fees the representative must show:

(1) That services were actually rendered.—Whittemore v. Coleman, 144 Ill.App. 109, affirmed 88 N.E. 228, 239 Ill. 450.

(2) What such services were.—Matter of O'Hara, 100 N.Y.S. 635, 50 Misc. 495—24 C.J. p 100 note 33.

or fails,⁸⁰ provided the litigation was proper,⁸¹ related to property of, or claims in favor of or against, the estate,⁸² was undertaken and conducted in good faith,⁸³ and with reasonable prudence,⁸⁴ for the benefit of the estate,⁸⁵ and was reasonably necessary,⁸⁶ either because the rights concerned were complicated and conflicting,⁸⁷ or because the questions involved in the dispute were such that there might reasonably be an honest and sincere difference of opinion as to the proper solution thereof.⁸⁸

The circumstances of each particular case govern in determining whether or not an allowance should

Personal liability of representative and effect thereof. As has been seen in § 199 supra, the estate is not primarily liable for legal services rendered for the benefit of the estate at the request of the personal representative, but the representative is personally liable with the right, as has been stated above, of reimbursement for reasonable expenditures. From this it follows that an allowance for counsel fees, in the absence of contrary statute, is made to the representative as such and not to the attorney,⁹⁰ and the fees are not paid from the assets

(2) Where Representative Is an Attorney

A representative who is himself an attorney may properly employ at the expense of the estate another attorney, if necessary. Where he acts as his own attorney the authorities differ as to whether he may be allowed credit for his services as such.

A personal representative who is himself an attorney may properly employ, at the expense of the estate, another attorney to assist him in the settlement of the estate provided such employment is necessary.⁴

Services of representative as attorney. In many jurisdictions the view prevails that an executor or administrator cannot be allowed credit for his services to the estate as an attorney,⁵ or even for attorney's fees incurred by him and paid to a firm of lawyers of which he is a member where his membership entitles him to a share in such fees;⁶ but in other jurisdictions an executor or administrator who performs legal services for the estate is held entitled to an allowance therefor by way of extra compensation,⁷ unless, in the case of an executor, his compensation as executor and attorney is fixed by the will.⁸

(2) But he may recover for necessary or extraordinary legal services performed by him.—Jones v. Peabody, supra.

Good faith in making charge required

Claim of executor for attorney's fees for services rendered by himself as an attorney in connection with lease executed for estate was properly rejected, where executor did not consider services of sufficient moment to entitle him to fee until his claim for double compensation was rejected.—Koteen v. Bickers, 177 S.E. 904, 163 Va. 676.

8. Terms of will binding

An executor under a will, by accepting the trust, is bound by the terms of the will fixing his compensation and is properly surcharged

(3) Approval of Court

A representative need not secure permission of the court before employing counsel nor need he secure judicial approval before paying counsel fees. He proceeds at his own risk, however, if he does not first obtain such approval.

It is not necessary that attorney's fees paid by an executor or administrator should have been fixed or approved by the court before payment in order to entitle him to credit therefor;⁹ but, aside from a sanction previously given, the probate court may in its just discretion allow a credit for professional services reasonably and honestly employed.¹⁰ Indeed it has been held that a disbursement made by the representative to an attorney to protect the estate in litigation pursuant to authority granted by the court of probate, should, on final accounting, be allowed, although the reviewing tribunal might not have authorized the disbursement had its judgment been invoked in the first instance.¹¹ Nevertheless an administrator who pays attorney's fees without an order of court does so at his own risk;¹² and the same is true where he pays the fees under a void order¹³ or before the order becomes final and conclusive.¹⁴

Conclusiveness of order of allowance. While orders for the allowance and payment of counsel fees

may be binding, under certain circumstances, on parties beneficially interested in the estate,¹⁵ unless the orders were procured by fraud,¹⁶ ex parte orders for the allowance and payment of counsel fees are not res judicata, and the fees may be contested on the settlement of the final account of the representative.¹⁷

Approving employment of counsel. While the court has authority to make an order authorizing a representative to employ counsel and provide that the fees shall be fixed at a future time on the completion of the services,¹⁸ it is not essential that the representative should procure the permission of the court before employing counsel.¹⁹

b. Costs and Other Expenses of Litigation

While a personal representative, as a rule, is individually responsible for costs recovered against him, he is entitled to credit in his account or reimbursement from the estate for all costs and other expenses of litigation necessarily incurred by him in good faith for the benefit of the estate.

While a personal representative, unless relieved by statute from such liability,²⁰ is individually responsible, as a rule, for costs recovered against him,²¹ he is entitled to credit in his account or reimbursement from the estate for all costs and other expenses of litigation properly incurred by him as

§ 224. — Employment by Co-fiduciaries

As a general rule co-fiduciaries should be represented by the same, rather than separate, counsel.

Although circumstances may arise in the particular case justifying each of several co-executors or co-administrators in employing separate counsel, if the cost to the estate is not duplicated thereby,²⁸ as a general rule they should all be represented by the same attorney,²⁹ the act of the majority governing in his selection.³⁰

An attorney for one of two executors, who collected money belonging to the estate, is entitled thereto, as against the co-executor, where he had performed services for the estate, on the request of one of the executors, in excess of the amount collected, and had claimed a lien on the sum collected, and thereafter the executor at whose request he had rendered his services agreed that he should retain it and apply it on account of such services.³¹

The mere fact that one of two co-fiduciaries is an attorney does not necessarily preclude the other from employing counsel to assist him in

In Michigan

(1) The executor of an unprobated will is not as a rule entitled to an allowance out of the estate for expenses incurred by him incident to the probate of the will.—In re Grover's Estate, 206 N.W. 988, 233 Mich. 467.—Freeman v. Hulbert, 203 N.W. 158, 230 Mich. 455.—Stover v. Durfee, 189 N.W. 14, 219 Mich. 566.

(2) Exceptional cases, however, may arise where such expenses might well be considered for the benefit of the estate and therefore allowable.—In re Grover's Estate, supra—Stover v. Durfee, supra.

(3) And under a recent statute one named as executor in a will may, where the will is denied probate,³³ the rule prevailing in the majority of jurisdictions is that he may be allowed his reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, even though he is met with a will contest³⁴ and the will is denied probate,³⁵ provided he acted in good faith³⁶ and with reasonable prudence³⁷ and did not engage in unnecessary litigation,³⁸ the will was not procured by his undue influsubject to the approval of the judge of probate, employ counsel at the expense of the estate to assist in securing the admission of the will to probate when a notice of contest is filed.—In re Grover's Estate, supra.

(4) Under this statute the power to authorize such employment requires action by the "probate court" and a record to be made thereof.—Freeman v. Hulbert, supra.

Attempt to probate in solemn form

(1) If a will is not previously admitted to probate in common form, and letters testamentary have not been granted thereon, compensation for counsel fees incurred by an executor in an unsuccessful attempt to probate a putative will in solemn form will not be allowed.—Young v. Freeman, 113 S.E. 204, 153 Ga. 827.

(2) The fact that the instrument propounded cannot, for any reason, be propounded in common form does not alter the rule.—Irwin v. Peek, 155 S.E. 515, 171 Ga. 375, reversing 150 S.E. 863, 40 Ga.App. 624, vacated 156 S.E. 44, 42 Ga.App. 270.

Male adopted by statute

Statute allowing executor, presenting will for probate in good faith, reasonable expenses and attorney's fees out of estate, held not unconstitutional.—Williams v. Hankins, 245 P. 483, 79 Colo. 237.

Discretion of court

Whether an allowance should be made is a matter resting largely within the discretion of the court.—In re Silva's Estate, 84 P.2d 59, 29 Cal.App.2d 52.

Where named executor is an attorney

If necessary, one named as executor in a will and offering it for probate may employ counsel to assist in resisting will contest, although he is attorney obligated under will to render professional services.—In re Wahkon-tah-he-ump-ah's Estate, 261 P. 973, 128 Okl. 179.

Where will established

(1) Where the executor has acted in good faith in employing an attorney in proceedings to probate the will, and the will is established, the estate is chargeable with the expense of reasonable attorney's fees thus necessarily incurred.—Pendleton v. Hare, Tex.Com.App., 231 S.W. 234, reversing Hare v. Pendleton, Civ. App., 214 S.W. 948.

(2) On accounting by an executrix, the court did not err in allowing against the estate, counsel fees for opposing a contest of the will and procuring the probate thereof, in view of Rev.L. §§ 5859 and 5861, making it the duty of the executor to probate the will or to file a renunciation thereof, and in view of the fact that the person who employed the counsel to procure the probating of the will was the executrix and was the sole beneficiary thereunder and prevailed in the contest.—In re Hegarty's Estate, 222 P. 793, 47 Nev. 369.

Only proper expenses allowable

Only such expenses are allowed as are reasonable and proper under the circumstances.—Huff v. Huff, Civ. App., 98 S.W.2d 442, reversed on other grounds 124 S.W.2d 327, 132 Tex. 540.

Nature of proceeding

Proceeding in which executor filed will for probate, caveat was filed, and validity of will was tried and determined, was a will contest in which executor may be allowed attorney fees.—Williams v. Hankins, 245 P. 483, 79 Colo. 237.

Method of making allowance

Amount to be awarded for expenses and attorney's fees of one presenting will for probate as executor should be assessed on evidence by referee, court, or jury, and judgment should not be given at once for amount claimed.—Williams v. Hankins, supra.

In New York

(1) Formerly it was held that an executor named in a purported will was not entitled to his disbursements where the will offered by him was refused probate.—Dodd v. Anderson, 90 N.E. 1187, 197 N.Y. 466, 27 L.R.A., N.S., 336, 18 Ann.Cas. 738, reversing 115 N.Y.S. 658, 131 App.Div. 224, affirming 112 N.Y.S. 414.

(2) But under the statute later in force, Surrogate's Court Act § 278, he may, whether successful or not, in the discretion of the surrogate, be awarded all necessary disbursements made by him and all expenses incurred in the attempt to sustain in good faith the will offered by him for probate.—In re Staiger's Will, 164 N.E. 33, 249 N.Y. 229, modifying 229 N.Y.S. 523, 224 App.Div. 81.

(3) The statute applies where he attempts to sustain a lost will.—In re Staiger's Will, supra.

(4) And it applies even though his attempt to sustain the will involves the contesting of another will.—In re Reimers' Will, 185 N.E. 403, 261 N.Y. 337, modifying 261 N.Y.S. 100, 237 App.Div. 343, and motion denied 188 N.E. 23, 262 N.Y. 468.

38. Unnecessary will contest

Where distribution of testator's property under will was the same that would have resulted if there had been no will, defense of will contest was not "necessary" within terms of statute governing authority of executrix, and hence denial of allowance to executrix and her attorneys for services rendered in defending the contest was not an abuse of discretion.—In re Silva's Estate, 84 P.2d

ence,³⁹ and it would not be inequitable or unjust to allow the expenses out of the estate.⁴⁰

Defending will admitted to probate. Where, after the will has been duly probated, suits are brought to revoke such probate or to test the validity of the will, the executor is generally entitled to receive from the estate his necessary expenditures in defending in good faith such attack⁴¹ even though his defense is unsuccessful,⁴² provided he did not engage in unnecessary litigation.⁴³ Accordingly a person named as executor in a will which has been admitted to probate is entitled to be reimbursed his counsel fees and expenses in opposing the probate of another paper subsequently propounded as a will,⁴⁴ even though the latter paper is established as the will and admitted to probate,⁴⁵ provided he acted in good faith.⁴⁶

39. D.C.—Wilson v. Veasey, 30 F.2d 310, 58 App.D.C. 301.

Allowance denied

Where a person named as executor in will was found to have exercised undue influence on testatrix and probate of will was denied, and costs taxed against executor by final judgment, executor could not, in subsequent proceeding, be allowed payment out of estate for court costs and reasonable attorneys' fees, particularly where he did not submit to jury issue of his good faith in offering will for probate.—Huff v. Rules distinguished

Rules governing the allowance of expenses and attorney's fees in proceedings to have a will admitted to probate do not necessarily govern where the action is to set aside a will already probated.—In re Engels' Will, 230 N.W. 519, 210 Iowa 36.

Contest withdrawn

Expenses in preparing for defense of will contest may be allowed, even though the contest is withdrawn before trial.—In re Peek's Will, 227 N. Y.S. 682, 131 Misc. 495.

Insolvent estate

Executors had authority, and it was their duty, to employ attorney to defend will against contest filed after probate, where estate then appeared to be solvent, and court properly allowed reasonable attorney's fee, although, when claim for attorney's fee was filed and allowed, estate had become insolvent.—In re Sullivan's Estate, 74 P.2d 346, 51 Ariz. 55.

In Pennsylvania

(1) A personal representative who becomes a party to an issue devisavit vel non must look to those who authorized him to engage therein and cannot charge his expenses to the estate he represents unless the latter is benefited by the proceeding.—In re Lowe's Estate, 192 A. 405, 326 Pa. 375, 111 A.L.R. 518.—In re Arnold's Estate, 97 A. 415, 252 Pa. 298.—Sheets's Appeal, 100 Pa. 197.—Yerkes' Appeal, 99 Pa. 401.—In re Scott, 9 Watts & S. 98.—Mumper's Appeal, 3 Watts & S. 441.—Geddis' Appeal, 9 Watts 284.—Alexander's Estate, 13 Pa. (3) The general rule that an executor will not be allowed counsel fees and costs in a contest to sustain a will by which he was appointed does not apply, however, where the executor is also a trustee, under a will which establishes a spendthrift trust.—In re Lowe's Estate, 192 A. 405, 326 Pa. 375, 111 A.L.R. 518.—In re Waller's Estate, 62 Pa.Super. 332, affirming 24 Pa.Dist. 85.—Hoffman's Estate, 19 Pa.Super. 70.

Evidence of bad faith

Although jury on issues submitted under caveat to will previously admitted to probate found that it was not executed according to law, that its terms were not known to deceased, and that he was not of sound and disposing memory, it was held that, as subscribing witnesses testified to due execution of will, etc., those nominated as executors who secured its probate cannot be denied credit for expenditures, etc., on theory that they were guilty of bad faith in probating the instrument.—Parker v. Leighton, 102 A. 552, 131 Md. 407.

Where an executor under a will probated in common form is called upon by heirs to probate it in solemn form, he is entitled to an allowance from the estate for reasonable attorney's fees, although the will may be refused probate.—Irwin v. Peek, 155 S.E. 515, 171 Ga. 375, reversing 150 S.E. 863, 40 Ga.App. 624, vacated 156 S.E. 44, 42 Ga.App. 270.—Young v. Freeman, 113 S.E. 204, 153 Ga. 827.—Davison v. Unnecessary appeal

Allowance denied

Expenses incurred by executor in Effect of personal interest. While the mere fact that an executor is personally interested in sustaining the will, as where he is a beneficiary thereunder, does not necessarily preclude him from receiving an allowance out of the estate for reasonable attorney's fees and other expenses incurred in defending the will against attack,⁴⁷ nevertheless this is a factor which the court may consider in determining his right to an allowance,⁴⁸ and where it appears that he acted in his individual capacity rather than in his representative capacity he is properly required to bear the expenses incurred without reimbursement from the estate.⁴⁹

Contest primarily between beneficiaries. In most cases a will contest presents merely a question between persons who take the estate if the will is established and those who will take it under the law of descent and distribution, if not established. In such cases the executor should leave these interested parties to conduct the litigation at their own expense and to abide its results without imposing substantial charges against the estate.⁵⁰ So, where the contest is in effect between devisees or legatees only and the estate is not otherwise interested therein, an allowance to the executor for attorney's fees incurred in sustaining the efforts of such devisees or legatees as are personally interested in carrying out⁵¹ or defeating⁵² the terms of the will may be denied.

Opposition to will by administrator. It has been held that an administrator who opposes the probate of a paper offered as the last will of the decedent cannot, although contesting honestly, be allowed reimbursement for the costs, expenses, and counsel fees for which he has made himself liable, especially in case the will becomes established,⁵³ but there is also authority for the contrary view.⁵⁴

Time of allowance. An allowance for expenses in preparing for the defense of a will contest cannot be made in advance of the hearing of the contest on the merits,⁵⁵ and in advance of such hearing the court cannot approve a contract binding the estate for a reasonable attorney's fee.⁵⁶

b. Procuring Appointment or Qualification

The authorities are in conflict as to the right of a representative to reimbursement for expenses incurred in procuring his appointment or qualification in the probate court.

Statutory regulations

Under statute providing that fees may be allowed in the probate "and execution of will of deceased persons," executor had right to employ attorneys to defend the will in contest between heirs and was entitled to allowance for attorneys' fees to be paid from the estate, as against contention that validity of will was only a dispute among heirs, and executor was not a necessary party to the contest and therefore not entitled to attorneys' fees.—Quinn v. Driver, 136 S.W.2d 1015, 199 Ark. 1058.

51. Iowa.—In re Jewe's Will, 208 N.W. 723, 201 Iowa 1154.
24 C.J. p 101 note 47 [1].

Charging expenses to beneficiary

Where a will contest was conducted by the executor mainly in the interest of a particular beneficiary under the will, it has been regarded as proper to allow the attorneys' fees incurred and paid by the executor as a charge on the share of such beneficiary rather than as a charge on the general estate.—In re Smith, 146 N.W. 836, 165 Iowa 614.

52. Raising issue of ademption

Expenses incurred by an executor in unsuccessfully assailing the will by raising an issue of ademption are not a proper expenditure by him as executor, and in the absence of evidence of an express agreement on the part of the legatees to reimburse him for the costs the estate is not liable therefor.—Barnard v. Keathley, 130 S.W. 306, 230 Mo. 209.

While it has been held that an executor or administrator is entitled to reimbursement for the just and reasonable expenses incurred in procuring his appointment or qualification in the probate court,⁵⁷ there is also considerable authority for the view that such an allowance should not be made,⁵⁸ and a denial of such an allowance is unquestionably proper where the appointment was improperly procured over the objection of those having a superior right to the appointment⁵⁹ or by falsely representing that the appointee was entitled to administer.⁶⁰ So also expenses incurred in a controversy between executors, one opposing the qualification of the others, are not proper charges against the estate.⁶¹

c. Collection and Protection of Assets

A representative is entitled to an allowance of counsel fees and other expenses necessarily incurred in collecting or protecting the estate assets.

A personal representative is justified in employing an attorney, when necessary, to assist him in collecting or protecting the assets of the estate.⁶² Accordingly he is entitled to attorney's fees paid in an action necessary to collect debts or assets of the estate,⁶³ and counsel fees and costs necessarily incurred in asserting or defending title to assets are properly allowed.⁶⁴

d. Resisting Claims against Estate

A personal representative is generally entitled to an allowance of counsel fees and other expenses incurred in resisting claims against the estate.

An executor or administrator is entitled to an allowance of counsel fees and other expenses incurred in resisting claims against the estate,⁶⁵ and in any particular case his right is determined by whether or not he acted in good faith and with reasonable prudence, rather than by his success or failure in the litigation.⁶⁶

Claims based on contract to make will. As a general rule a personal representative is entitled to an allowance for reasonable attorney's fees and other expenses incurred in resisting a claim against the estate for the specific performance of an alleged contract of decedent to make a will in favor of claimants or for damages for the breach of such contract,⁶⁷ although such an allowance has been denied in some instances.⁶⁸

In Maryland

(1) A person having an exclusive right to administer an estate is entitled to an allowance for counsel fees incurred in the defense of such right.—Horton v. Horton, 149 A. 552, 158 Md. 626—Ex parte Young, 8 Gill 285.

(2) But an administratrix having no exclusive right to administer is not entitled to counsel fees in defending letters of administration which were ultimately revoked because prematurely issued.—Horton v. Horton, supra.

(3) One appointed as administratrix is not entitled to an allowance for expenses incurred in resisting the claims of others who had the same legal right to administration as the appointee had.—Horton v. Horton, supra.

Failure to maintain appointment

Counsel fees for services rendered in an unsuccessful effort to maintain a representative's appointment are not chargeable against the estate.—Succession of Marcour, La.App., 173 So. 587.

59. "Where a personal representative has been appointed by the court over the objections of those having a superior right to the appointment, or to designate the appointee, and which appointed representative was never designated by the decedent in any manner or form, or by any other person having the remotest connection with the estate to be administered, and where such appointee incurs expenses in an endeavor to sustain his apparently arbitrary nomination by the appointing authority, he should not be allowed his counsel fees incurred in endeavoring to hold on to his appointment; and especially should that be true when the representative seeking the allowance qualified at a time when the order nominating him was suspended by a pending motion to set it aside."—Louisville Trust Co. v. e. Procuring Direction of Court

Where his rights and duties are left in reasonable doubt, a representative may be entitled to an allowance of counsel fees and other expenses incurred in procuring judicial direction.

Executors and administrators may take the opinion of the court or procure its advice, aid, protection, or sanction at the expense of the estate, in cases where their rights and duties are left in reasonable doubt; and in similar proceedings commenced by others to which they are made parties their reasonable counsel fees and expenses will be allowed.⁶⁹ Nevertheless reimbursement may be denied where a judicial direction is sought needlessly or in bad faith or with needless accumulation of expense.⁷⁰

f. Miscellaneous Matters

A personal representative has been held entitled, or not entitled, to an allowance for counsel fees and other expenses of litigation incurred in various particular matters other than those which have been specifically considered in the preceding subdivisions of this section.

An executor or administrator is not entitled to credit in his account for counsel fees paid by him for services rendered in contesting a proper charge against him;⁷¹ but he is entitled to credit for reasonable counsel fees and other expenses incurred in resisting improper charges,⁷² opposition to his proper official acts,⁷³ or improper attacks on his accounts, see § 940 infra. The representative may be allowed for his counsel fees and costs in probate proceedings in the line of his duty,⁷⁴ an appeal justly taken,⁷⁵ continuing in good faith a suit begun by his decedent,⁷⁶ defending an action by the widow to set aside her consent to the will,⁷⁷ foreclosing a mortgage,⁷⁸ or enforcing notes or contracts running to himself for the benefit of the estate,⁷⁹ or in a suit properly brought by an administrator de bonis non for a settlement of the estate,⁸⁰ or criminal proceedings against an impostor or one personating an heir, when proper for the protection of the estate.⁸¹ Expenses incurred in preparation for expected litigation will be allowed, although the dispute results in a compromise,⁸² as will also the costs of setting aside a sale of decedent's real estate where a subsequent sale realizes more than the first.⁸³ Where an executrix' contention that the will gave her, as life tenant, the right to dispose of the principal as far as she deemed necessary for her support, has been sustained after litigation, she may charge her reasonable cost of the litigation against the principal;⁸⁴ and where the nominated executor in good faith appeals from an order of the court rejecting the will it is proper for him to bring a suit in equity to prevent a threatened distribution of the estate by the administrator, and he is entitled to be reimbursed for the costs thereof, although he does not succeed on his appeal.⁸⁵ Reasonable and necessary traveling expenses of the attorney have also been allowed.⁸⁶

On the other hand, the representative should not be allowed for counsel fees and costs in proceedings undertaken merely to vindicate the good name of decedent,⁸⁷ litigation with reference to real estate not in his charge,⁸⁸ resisting payment of a bill for reasonable funeral expenses,⁸⁹ or attempting to enforce a contract by which the widow agrees to take a child's share in lieu of dower, the contract having been set aside as fraudulent.⁹⁰ No allowance should be made for a payment merely as a retainer,⁹¹ for attendance of counsel at sales of land by the executor when no necessity therefor is shown,⁹² or for the services of an attorney in the management of the estate while the representative was enjoined from transacting the business of the estate,⁹³ or in procuring evidence in actions brought against the estate,⁹⁴ or in acting as a director of a corporation wholly owned by deceased.⁹⁵ The expense incurred by a representative in seeking to recover excessive compensation for his services is not a proper charge against the estate,⁹⁶ and the counsel fees and expenses of an executor in attending a reference for distribution when there was a contest with the legatees have been disallowed.⁹⁷ Where an executor appeals from an order of the probate court making an allowance for the support of a widow, and brings error to an order dismissing the appeal, he is liable personally for the costs in both courts.⁹⁸

Prosecution of slayer; death actions. An executor has been allowed credit for money expended in procuring the arrest, and conducting the prosecution, of a person who killed decedent,⁹⁹ although the weight of authority is against such an allowance,¹ and generally the assets of the estate cannot be used to defray the cost of a suit for the wrongful death of decedent.²

Removal of representative. Generally a representative is entitled to an allowance for counsel fees and other expenses incurred in resisting an unsuccessful attempt to remove him.³ Where the attempt is successful, however, he is not entitled as a rule to an allowance,⁴ unless it appears that he acted in good faith in his resistance.⁵

Counsel fees paid by one executor in endeavoring unsuccessfully to remove his coexecutor will not be allowed out of the estate.⁶

§ 226. — Grounds for Refusing Allowance

- a. In general
- b. Expenses caused by representative's fault or misconduct
- c. Litigation for benefit of particular persons
- d. Personal benefit of representative
- e. Services which representative should perform

a. In General

Various matters have been held to constitute, or not to constitute, sufficient grounds for refusing the representative an allowance for counsel fees and other expenses of litigation.

Circumstances authorizing allowance

sel fees and other expenses of litigation where such expenses were unnecessary or were not incurred with reasonable prudence, in good faith, and for the benefit of the estate. So also an allowance for counsel fees may be refused where the advice of counsel was asked and inexcusably disregarded by the representative;⁷ where the services of counsel were rendered wholly in opposition to the estate,⁸ or were not in aid of any duty owed by the representative to the estate;⁹ where the attorney had agreed to make no further charge for his services,¹⁰ or it was understood that his fee would be paid otherwise and not by the estate;¹¹ where the representative exceeded his powers in acting with reference to the matter as to which the fees are claimed,¹² or has been guilty of mismanaging the estate;¹³ where the charges paid or incurred by the personal representative were illegal;¹⁴ or, in a proper case, where only a small balance remains in the estate.¹⁵ A charge for an attorney's services in attempting to rectify his own neglect in failing to interpose a proper plea has been disallowed;¹⁶ and an administrator cannot charge the estate with expenses incurred in advising with counsel with respect to interests and demands antagonistic to the claims of the heirs, when he knows that such counsel is representing the antagonistic interests.¹⁷

On the other hand, it is not necessarily a sufficient ground for refusing an allowance for attorney's fees that the representative failed to take advantage of a technical defense against the attorney,¹⁸ that the services were rendered under a champertous retainer,¹⁹ or that the attorney was also employed by one of the heirs, devisees, or legatees.²⁰

b. Expenses Caused by Representative's Fault or Misconduct

No allowance will be made for counsel fees and other similar expenses necessitated by the representative's own fault or misconduct.

A personal representative is not entitled to credit in his account for counsel fees paid by him for services necessitated by his own fault or misconduct.²¹ Accordingly he is not entitled to any allowance or credit for his fees, costs, or other expenses in a litigation made necessary by his own negligence, misconduct, or maladministration,²² but negligence

Failure to file reports

Where an executor did not apply to the county court for advice in the management of the estate, and for more than eight years made no report of his dealings, although required by statute to account semi-annually, it was held that the court properly denied him any attorney's fees.—In re Roach, 92 P. 118, 50 Or. 179.

Mismanagement held not to preclude allowance

(1) Even though the representative has mismanaged the estate, an allowance for reasonable attorney's fees necessarily incurred for services to the estate should be allowed where the element of mismanagement may be taken care of by denying the representative compensation.—In re Paine's Estate, 174 So. 430, 128 Fla. 151.

Payments by administratrix to attorney should not be condemned as "unreasonable" or "unnecessary," within statute, because services were rendered under champertous retainer.—In re Gilman's Adm'x, supra.

20. Contingent fee contract

The fact that a sole legatee and devisee had entered into a contingent fee contract with attorneys to represent her and collect her claims under the will was no ground for disallowance of a credit in the account of testator's personal representative of a reasonable attorney's fee paid to the same attorneys for services rendered in the administration of the estate.—In re Rothgiber's Estate, Ohio App., 31 N.E.2d 687.

c. Litigation for Benefit of Particular Persons

Expenses attending litigation for the benefit of particular heirs, legatees, or other persons should not be allowed out of the general estate.

The costs, fees, and expenses attending a litigation for the benefit of particular heirs, legatees, next of kin, or other persons should be allowed, if at all, as against their own particular funds or interests, proportionately or wholly, as the case may be, rather than out of the general estate;²⁴ and a fortiori an executor or administrator who expends money for attorney's fees or costs for the benefit of persons whose interests are antagonistic to the estate is not entitled to recover against the estate for such advances.²⁵

d. Personal Benefit of Representative

A personal representative cannot be allowed, as against the estate, the costs and expenses of litigation or the employment of counsel for his own individual benefit.

The representative is not entitled to an allowance from the estate for the services of an attorney:

Iowa 384, petition overruled 184 N.W. 749, 192 Iowa 384.

(2) In defending a partition proceeding in which the executor in his individual capacity was made a party.—In re Banfield's Estate, 299 P.

(4) In seeking to establish the representative's individual claim of a copartnership interest in the decedent's business.—In re Rosenberg's Will, 2 N.Y.S.2d 300, 165 Misc. 92.

(5) In attempting to open an assessment of inheritance taxes in order to discharge the representative from a liability arising from his own misconduct.—In re Flaacke, (Prerog.) 64 A. 1020, affirmed 73 A. 1117, 72 N.J.Eq. 944.

Where an administrator paid claims against his intestate's estate and took assignments thereof in the name of another for his benefit, but it did not appear that the administrator's private funds were used for such purpose, the estate was not interested in the classification of such claims, and hence the cost of litigation carried on by the administrator with reference to such classification, apparently in his individual interest, should be paid by him personally, and not from the funds of the estate.—Felsenthal v. Kline, 73 N.E. 428, 214 Ill. 121.

Retaining property

A decedent's estate cannot be charged with the expenses of the executor in the employment of counsel to oppose a motion by the executrix to compel him to deliver to her personal property of the estate in his hands on which he claimed commissions.—Matter of Whitney, 136 N.Y.S. 633, 75 Misc. 610.

Question of fact

Whether litigation by a personal representative may be said to be solely for his own individual benefit or for that of the estate is a question of fact.—In re Dutcher's Estate, 295 N.Y.S. 643, 251 App.Div. 184.

distributee, to protect which he contests against others,²⁷ or where he asserts against the estate his personal claims against decedent.²⁸ So also the expense incurred by an executor in a suit against him for the recovery of real estate in his possession in his capacity as an individual is not an expenditure required by him as executor, and the estate is not liable therefor.²⁹ The mere fact that a representative may personally profit from litigation does not necessarily affect his right to counsel fees out of the estate.³⁰ Thus the mere fact that he is beneficially interested in the estate is not sufficient to defeat his right to an allowance for expenses incurred in defending against claims asserted against the estate.³¹

Apportionment of costs and expenses of litigation as between representative and estate may sometimes be proper, as where a matter in litigation concerns the representative both personally and officially.³²

fee may be considered in fixing the fee to be allowed,⁴⁴ and the allowance may be made more liberal because of that fact.⁴⁵

The number of attorneys employed is not a determining factor in fixing the fee to be allowed.⁴⁶ Indeed, where more than one attorney is unnecessarily⁴⁷ employed by the representative, no more can be allowed for such attorneys' services than would amount to reasonable compensation if only one were employed,⁴⁸ and in such case the single reasonable compensation allowed must be divided among the several attorneys rendering services.⁴⁹ So, where co-fiduciaries are each represented by independent counsel, the aggregate amount allowed as counsel fees should not exceed what would be allowed if only one counsel represented the fiduciaries.⁵⁰

Excessive fee retained by attorney. A representative has been held entitled to credit for the entire amount of an excessive fee retained by a firm of attorneys from funds collected by them, where the representative sought to recover a part of such fee from the attorneys, but was unsuccessful mainly because of their pecuniary irresponsibility.⁵¹

Nonlegal services. Charges made by an attorney for services not of a legal character,⁵² such as services which are strictly clerical,⁵³ cannot be allowed for at the rates charged for strictly legal services.

A testamentary limitation as to the amount which may be paid for legal services is not generally binding on the executor.⁵⁴

Statutes fixing amount of allowance. In a number of jurisdictions the exact amount, or the maximum amount, which may be allowed as counsel fees is fixed by statute, and no greater amount may be allowed⁵⁵ except where the statute authorizes an in-

55. Allowance based on value of estate

Where the amount allowable as a fee for ordinary services of counsel is fixed by statute on the basis of the amount of estate accounted for by the representative, profits made by the representative in operating decedent's business should be considered in fixing the allowance, but an allowance based on an inventory valuation of the estate is improper where the main estate assets are sold for less than half their appraised value.—In re Allen's Estate, 108 P.2d 973, 42 Cal.App.2d 346.

Retroactive operation of statute

Statute fixing amount to be allowed for ordinary services rendered by counsel held applicable to services rendered before its enactment, where allowance was made thereafter.—In re McClellan's Estate, 183 N.W. 398, 192 Iowa 384, petition overruled 184 N.W. 749, 192 Iowa 384.

Statute held inapplicable

A statute fixing the maximum amount allowable as administrator's fees has no application to attorney's fees.—In re Cheney's Estate, 85 P.2d 729, 103 Colo. 319.

Allowance held proper

Under a statute limiting the amount allowable for counsel fees to that allowed as compensation to the representative except in case of actual litigation, a counsel fee which is not in excess of the amount permitted the representative as compen-

creased allowance for extraordinary services rendered by counsel.⁵⁶

Under a statute fixing the maximum amount to be allowed the representative, of course, is not entitled to the full amount permitted by the statute where the actual fees incurred and paid are less.⁵⁷

Waiver. The objection that a fee paid by a representative is excessive may be waived by parties interested in the estate by failing properly to present the objection.⁵⁸ sation may properly be allowed, even though it is in excess of the amount actually charged by the representative for his services.—In re Reed's Estate, 259 P. 815, 37 Wyo. 107, 55 A.L.R. 941.

56. Allowance not mandatory

Even though the attorney may have performed some extraordinary services, the court may in its sound discretion disallow a claim for extra compensation if the sum otherwise allowed appears to be reasonable compensation.—In re Fulton's Estate, 73 P.2d 664, 23 Cal.App.2d 563.

In the absence of allegation and proof respecting extraordinary services no allowance therefor can be made.—In re Murphy's Estate, 228 N.W. 658, 209 Iowa 679.

What constitute extraordinary services

The mere fact that the attorney represented the estate on an appeal from an order of the probate court does not as a matter of law show that he had rendered extraordinary services within the statute entitling him to additional compensation.—In re McClellan's Estate, 183 N.W. 398, 192 Iowa 384, petition overruled 184 N.W. 749, 192 Iowa 384.

Amount of allowances

(1) Under a statute authorizing an extra allowance for extraordinary services of counsel, such an allowance is not limited in amount to the sum allowable to the representative.—In re Pringle's Estate, 67 P.2d 204, 51 Wyo. 353, 110 A.L.R. 987.

Allowance out of particular funds

(1) Where, in a suit by an administratrix to foreclose a mortgage, the chancery court, without notice and in violation of the statute, ordered the sale price transferred to the circuit court in which a judgment had been recovered against a former administrator, the administratrix is not precluded by such order made without notice from deducting from the fund amounts advanced by her for court costs.—Parker v. Baker, 114 S.W.2d 23, 195 Ark. 761.

(2) Where insured had pledged life policy to secure debt exceeding amount of policy made payable to insured's estate, administratrix of insured's estate was not entitled to judgment for costs of administration of insured's succession from proceeds of policy notwithstanding proceeds of policy constituted only asset of insured's estate.—Foote v. Sun Life Assur. Co. of Canada, La. App., 173 So. 477.

(3) Where an executor brought a suit to test the validity of a bequest and the bequest was upheld, he was not entitled to costs and counsel fees out of the proceeds of the sale of the property bequeathed.—Stevens v. Stevens, 37 N.J.Eq. 2.

(5) Where a will was admitted to probate, and one of the heirs was appointed executor, and by undue means an election by the widow to take under the will was procured, but on suit brought by her was afterward set aside, the costs and attorney's fees incurred by the executor in defending the action could not be paid out of the estate until after the widow obtained her share.—Sill v. Sill, 1 P. 556, 31 Kan. 248.

(6) Where, on partition of realty for purposes of distribution, the court ordered one portion thereof sold, the executor who made the sale had no authority to pay attorney's fees, except so far as the court might order them to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale.—Snyder's Appeal, 54 Pa. 67.

(7) In a case where a substituted trustee, accounting for the acts of a prior deceased trustee, was also executor to that trustee, the court divided between the estates a bill of his attorneys for services which were beneficial to both estates.—Matter of Rowe, 86 N.Y.S. 253, 42 Misc. 172, 4 Mills Surr. 131.

(8) Expenses incurred by executors and trustees in successfully defending legacies made under power of appointment from certain taxes must be paid from residue, under general rule that expenses of administration are so payable, although incurred largely with reference to certain legacies.—Dexter v. b. Tombstones and Monuments

Generally a personal representative should be allowed credit for a reasonable expenditure for a tombstone or monument for decedent.

A reasonable expenditure for a tombstone or monument placed at the grave of decedent is properly classed as a funeral expense,⁶⁷ and the personal representative should be allowed credit in his accounts for such expenditure,⁶⁸ even though there is no express direction or request in the will for a monument,⁶⁹ and notwithstanding the objection of some of the legatees and next of kin, where the ex-

Amount of expenditure see infra § 230 e.

Personal liability of representative on contract for tombstone see supra § 200.

Approval of court

A statute providing that the expenditure for a tombstone shall be subject to approval of the court, is intended as a check on the acts of a personal representative and to make him conform to what, under the circumstances, in the opinion of the court, seem to be just and reasonable, and the statute vests in the court a discretion which is to be exercised in the light of all the circumstances.—In re Poole's Will, 293 N. W. 918, 235 Wis. 625.

Power of court

Even though the statute authorizes the probate court to allow an administrator any reasonable sum for a tombstone for decedent, the court is without jurisdiction, in advance of the settlement of the estate, to entertain an application to fix a sum for that purpose and order the administrator, if the monument is not procured by the widow or next of kin, to erect such monument and charge the expense to the estate.—In re Ferguson, 89 N.E. 1070, 81 Ohio St. 58.

Effect of receipt of death benefits

The reasonable cost of erecting a tombstone is chargeable against the estate even though the administratrix, as the surviving wife, has received from beneficial associations of which deceased was a member funds for the payment of his funeral expenses in excess of the amount actually expended for his burial.—In re Crider's Estate, 20 Pa. Dist. & Co. 113.

Keeping monument in repair

Reasonable cost of keeping a monument in repair is properly a part of the "funeral expenses."—In re Maverick's Estate, 119 N.Y.S. 914, 135 App.Div. 44, affirmed 92 N.E. 1084, 198 N.Y. 618—24 C.J. p 93 note 63 [b].

Expenditure made by another

Disallowing administrator credit for tombstone decedent's father purchased for decedent without expected reimbursement from decedent's estate is proper.—Ward v. Tatum, 130 So. 898, 222 Ala. 66.

Markers placed at graves of others

Generally a representative will not be allowed credit for the cost of markers or monuments placed at the graves of other members of decedent's family.—Holt v. Holt, 123 S.E. 53, 96 W.Va. 337.

Public library as monument

Executor, without express authority under will, may not erect public library as monument to memory of deceased, and charge expense to estate as part of funeral expense.—In re Bruggemeyer's Estate, 2 P.2d 534, 115 Cal.App. 525.

Bequest for monument

In proceeding for settlement of executors' account, a bequest in testatrix' will for erection of gravestone will be allowed as reasonable funeral expense to extent of cost thereof.—In re Hurwitz' Estate, 28 N.Y.S.2d 792, 176 Misc. 719.

(1) It has been held that the expenditure of a reasonable sum out of the estate for the purpose of marking decedent's grave is authorized.—Succession of Dunn, 6 La.App. 663.

(2) But it has also been held that a curator has no authority to expend the means of the estate for the erection of a tomb over decedent's grave without the consent of the heir.—Hisem v. Lemel, 19 La. 425.

39. Cal.—Seitz v. Engert, 56 P.2d 1242, 13 Cal.App.2d 302.

penditure has been approved by the majority of those beneficially interested.⁷⁰ A moderate expenditure for a tombstone is sometimes allowed, even though the estate is insolvent,⁷¹ although there is also authority for the view that an allowance is improper under such circumstances.⁷²

Provision by decedent in his lifetime. A personal representative cannot be allowed the expense of procuring a monument where deceased in his lifetime provided one himself.⁷³

Family mausoleum. Generally a personal representative is not entitled to be allowed credit for expenditures for the erection of a family mausoleum,⁷⁴ unless such expenditures are authorized by the will.⁷⁵

c. Burial Lots

Generally a personal representative should be allowed the cost of a suitable burial lot in which to inter decedent and in some instances he may also be allowed the cost of perpetual care of the lot.

Generally a personal representative should be allowed the cost of a suitable burial lot in which to inter decedent,⁷⁶ and it has been held that an ad-

ministratrix should be allowed the sum paid for a grave for decedent even though the lot was taken in her own name personally.⁷⁷ A representative, however, cannot be allowed the expense of procuring a burial lot, where decedent in his lifetime provided one himself.⁷⁸

The cost of improving and enclosing a burial lot should not, it has been held, be allowed where objection thereto is made;⁷⁹ but it has also been held that, where the will directs the executors to erect and maintain a fence around a cemetery and charges all expenses directed by it on lands devised, the executors can maintain a suit in equity against the devisees of the land or their assigns for the expenses of erecting such fence.⁸⁰

Upkeep of lot. While a payment for perpetual care of the burial lot is sometimes authorized by statute,⁸¹ or may be authorized by the terms of the will,⁸² it has been held that in the absence of such statutory authorization or testamentary sanction, a personal representative may not expend any portion of the estate for the upkeep of decedent's grave,⁸³ although there is also authority to the contrary.⁸⁴

Where statute provides for determination by probate court of the amount which may be paid for perpetual care of deceased's burial lot, the court cannot dismiss a petition to pay a certain sum without fixing a reasonable amount which may be paid.—Hall v. Burgess, 100 A. 1013, 40 R.I. 314.

82. Authority conferred

Will directing executors to expend not more than a certain sum for erection of family mausoleum authorized executors to pay sum for perpetual care and maintenance of mausoleum and burial plot.—In re Myers' Estate, 250 N.Y.S. 660, 140 Misc. 442.

84. Expenditure allowed

No meritorious objection could be made to an expenditure for perpetual care of tomb of testator without heirs in the country, there being

d. Mourning Apparel for Family

The authorities differ as to whether a personal representative is entitled to an allowance for moneys expended for mourning apparel for decedent's family.

It has been held that the executor or administrator is entitled to a moderate allowance for moneys which he has properly expended in obtaining suitable mourning apparel for the widow and children of decedent,⁸⁵ even though the estate is insolvent,⁸⁶ but in other cases this has been denied.⁸⁷

e. Amount of Expenditure

In the absence of contrary testamentary provision, an expenditure for funeral expenses, tombstone, and the like must be reasonable in amount.

In the absence of contrary testamentary provision, an expenditure for funeral expenses, tombstone, and the like must be reasonable in amount, taking into consideration the value of the estate left by decedent, his solvency or insolvency, and his station in life;⁸⁸ and, if the personal representative is desirous of expending a greater sum than is reasonable in the particular case, he should first procure the assent of those entitled to the assets of the estate.⁸⁹

Effect of testamentary direction. As a general rule, the terms of the will are controlling as to the amount which may be expended out of the assets of the estate for funeral expenses, tombstone, and the like, where the will itself contains directions to the executor in this respect.⁹⁰ Thus a testamentary di-neither forced heirs nor creditors to be satisfied.—Succession of Williams, 101 So. 113, 156 La. 704.

rection authorizing the executor to expend not more than a fixed sum has the effect of prohibiting the expenditure of a greater sum.⁹¹ Such a direction, however, does not require the executor to expend the entire sum mentioned;⁹² and, of course, it does not license him to extravagantly disburse or waste such sum.⁹³

§ 231. Payment of Decedent's Debts

Generally a personal representative is entitled to credit for debts of the decedent which he has paid.

An executor or administrator is of course entitled to credit for debts of decedent which he has paid,⁹⁴ or for the amount paid out in settling a bona fide claim against the estate, whereby a saving has been effected,⁹⁵ but he cannot be allowed for an illegal claim which he paid to avoid family disgrace;⁹⁶

§ 232. Procuring Bond

The right of a personal representative to charge the estate with expenses incurred by him in procuring a bond depends on the nature of the bond, the facts in the particular case, and the governing statutes, if any.

In some states the statutes allow the expense of procuring a bond for the representative to be charged against the estate,⁹⁸ to the extent that the expense is reasonable and necessary,⁹⁹ and is not necessitated by the fault of the representative;¹ but surrogate, is improper, but payment may be ratified if court is satisfied that justice requires ratification.—In re Hepner, 206 N.Y.S. 217, 123 Misc. 758.

in the absence of such a statute it is well settled, as a general rule, that the amount paid by the personal representative to a guaranty or indemnity company or to individual bondsmen, in order to procure sureties on his official bond is not chargeable against the estate, in addition to his usual recompense.² The representative is, however, properly allowed the expense of a bond given to supersede a judgment rendered against the estate,³ or a special bond which is necessary in order to collect assets,⁴ and it has been held that where, at the instance of legatees, an executrix was ordered by the court to give a bond on pain of discharge, she should be allowed the expense thereof, since, if she had failed to furnish the bond and had been discharged, the substituted administrator would have been obliged to furnish one incurring in all probability the same expense.⁵

a. Personal Property

A personal representative may properly be credited with amounts necessarily expended for repairs of personal property while it was in his custody.

An executor or administrator may properly be credited with amounts necessarily expended for repairs of personal property while it was in his custody.⁸

b. Real Property

Ordinarily a personal representative is not authorized to repair or improve the realty of his decedent unless empowered to do so by the will or by statute or unless he is duly invested with the control or management of such property.

Since a personal representative is not ordinarily entitled to the immediate possession and control of his decedent's realty, as is indicated § 257 infra, he is not authorized, as a rule, to make repairs⁹ or improvements¹⁰ thereon and subject the estate or those beneficially interested to such expenditures. The power to make necessary repairs or improvements, however, may be conferred on the representative by the will¹¹ or by statute,¹² and where he is duly invested with the control or management amount of the funds thus diverted, with interest, he should be credited with rents collected by distributees before the fire.—Young v. Bowen, 108 S.E. 866, 131 Va. 401.

11. Ga.—Hattaway v. Hodgson Cotton Co., 149 S.E. 568, 169 Ga. 9.—Evans v. Dickey, 177 S.E. 87, 88, 50 Ga.App. 127, citing Corpus Juris.

Exercise of power binding on legatees

Provision of will authorizing executrix to mortgage property to make repairs in case buildings were injured by fire authorized executrix to make contract, for repairs necessitated by fire, binding on interest of legatees, although one of legatees was minor.—Kreutz v. Dublin Sash & Door Co., 184 S.E. 908, 53 Ga.App. 50.

of the realty, he may be allowed credit for what he has expended in good faith in necessary repairs¹³ and improvements,¹⁴ although expenditures and outlays in improvements are less favored, especially where the corresponding enhancement in value seems remote and uncertain, or the personal property is sacrificed for the benefit of the realty.¹⁵

Even though the representative may not be authorized to make repairs or improvements on realty, yet he may be allowed credit in his account for such expenditures where justice requires an allowance and no injustice results therefrom.¹⁶ Thus where the representative is charged with rents collected from the realty, he is entitled to credit out of the rents for reasonable expenditures made by him in good faith for necessary repairs¹⁷ or improvements.¹⁸

An executor has been held authorized to make reasonable repairs and improvements on leasehold

property occupied by the legatees or parties in interest jointly, where the lease contained a covenant of renewal, and to pay the value of improvements;¹⁹ and it has been held that an administrator who is also a tenant in common as a distributee will be allowed credit not for the cost of improvements put by him on the land, but for the value of such improvements to the premises.²⁰

Previous sanction of court. While it is the better practice for a personal representative to procure the permission of the court before proceeding to make a necessary repair or improvement, especially if it is of any considerable magnitude,²¹ yet this is not indispensable to the allowance of the expenditures if they are otherwise proper.²² Until judicial approval is obtained, however, such expenditures cannot be regarded as estate expenditures,²³ and if the representative chooses to make them without first

Power to make repairs extends only to such repairs as are necessary to keep the property in good condition, and does not authorize the making of improvements.—Rice v. Conwill, 80 S. W. 393, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 341—24 C.J. p 144 note 33.

Pending delivery of dower properties

Administrators were entitled to be reimbursed for expenditures for taxes, insurance, and necessary improvements and repairs on the dower properties, between assignment of dower and the date the dower properties were actually delivered to the wife, where such amounts were expended pending an appeal from the decree of the assignment of dower.—*Less v. 39. Failure to make distribution

Taxes paid by an executor on real estate, the distribution of which was delayed by him, should be disallowed because, if the distribution had been made when ordered, property would have been exempt from taxation.—In re Macky's Estate, 213 P. 131, 73 Colo. 1.

Failure to list mortgage interest

Where an administratrix held a claim secured by mortgage against the estate, and failed to list her mortgage interest, which exceeded the value of the property mortgaged, for taxation, but permitted the land to be taxed as though no mortgage existed thereon, she was not entitled to a credit for taxes paid by her as administratrix on the mortgaged real estate, since, had she listed her mortgage interest, there could have been no excess on which the estate would have been taxed.—McDougald v. Boggs, 79 P. 875, 146 Cal. 196.

Particular circumstances requiring allowance

(1) Where will on its face showed a lot to be part of residuary estate, although subsequently shown to have been covered by specific devise, taxes paid by executor in good faith

Even where the personal representative has paid out taxes not strictly in the line of his official duty, he may be entitled to be reimbursed by the heirs or devisees benefited thereby.⁴³

Penalty and interest. A claim by a personal representative for money paid as a penalty or interest on taxes should be disallowed where the penalty or interest accrued by reason of the representative's neglect or wrongful act.⁴⁴ thereon, under ex parte order of court and without objection, should be allowed.—In re Neil's Estate, 242 P. 820, 117 Or. 76.

(2) An executor will not be surcharged with the amount of an unnecessary stock transfer tax paid on certain estate securities in order to make a speedy sale thereof and to avoid the delay required in securing a tax waiver, where his action in so doing resulted in a profit to the estate.—In re Powell's Estate, 28 Pa. Dist. & Co. 623, 43 Dauph.Co. 325.

(3) Distributees could not require administrator to account for inheritance tax paid in good faith on distributable share, notwithstanding distributable share was appraised at greater amount than actual amount received by distributee.—Maynard v. Maynard's Adm'r, 64 S.W.2d 567, 251 Ky. 246, 91 A.L.R. 697.

(4) Executrix who has paid an inheritance tax to the federal government should not be surcharged to the amount thereof, on it subsequently appearing that the tax was not a proper one, where the sum paid may be recovered.—Matter of Marx, 103 N.Y.S. 416, 117 App.Div. 890, reversing 99 N.Y.S. 334, 49 Misc. 280.

42. Income tax on rentals

That executor paid gross income taxes on rentals received by him from devised realty was not prejudicial against devisees, where devisees would otherwise have had to pay taxes.—Cornet v. Guedelhoefer, Ind., 36 N.E.2d 933, mandate modified 37 N.E.2d 681.

Penalty resulting from advice of counsel

Penalty for executor's nonpayment

A reasonable fee of a transfer tax appraiser, which has been paid by the representative, should be allowed as a proper expenditure.⁴⁵

§ 236. Traveling Expenses

A personal representative is entitled to credit in his accounts for reasonable and necessary traveling expenses incurred in performing the duties of his trust.

In the settlement of an executor's or administrator's account, reasonable and necessary traveling expenses incurred in performing the duties of his trust should be allowed;⁴⁶ but it is otherwise where the expenses were needlessly or unreasonably incurred,⁴⁷ where the representative was put to no actual cost,⁴⁸ or where the journey was not connected with the business of the estate,⁴⁹ but rather with the representative's own personal business,⁵⁰ or that of the heirs.⁵¹ It has also been held that expenses incurred by a special administrator in traveling from another state, in which he resided, for the purpose of procuring his appointment are not allowable in his account,⁵² and that expenses incurred by an administrator in travelling from his home to the county where the estate is being administered may, in the discretion of the court, be disallowed.⁵³

§ 237. Expenditures for Benefit of Particular Legatees or Distributees

Generally a personal representative is not entitled to credit in his general account for expenditures for the benefit of particular legatees or distributees unless such expenditures are made under order of court or pursuant to statute or directions in the will.

As a general rule, a personal representative is not entitled to credit in his general account of the administration for disbursements made or expenses incurred for the benefit of particular legatees or distributees,⁵⁴ or payments or advances to particular of inheritance tax within statutory period was chargeable against executor, notwithstanding failure to make return thereof was result of advice of counsel, and not negligence.—In re Oakes' Estate, 217 N.Y.S. 638, 127 Misc. 779.

Maintenance of decedent's family

(1) At common law the maintenance and care of decedent's family form no part of the duty of an executor or administrator, and he has no right to make any expenditures out of the assets of the estate for that purpose.—Miller v. Oil City Iron Works, 45 S.W.2d 36, 184 Ark. 900—Alcorn v. Alcorn, 35 S.W.2d 1027, 183 Ark. 342—24 C.J. p 230 note 88.

(2) Statutory allowance to surviving spouse or children see infra §§ 323-366.

Education and support of children

(1) Strictly speaking an executor or administrator should not make expenditures for the education and maintenance of decedent's infant children and will not be allowed the same in his administration accounts.—Alcorn v. Alcorn, 35 S.W.2d 1027, 183 Ark. 342—24 C.J. p 238 note 83.

(2) Administrator had no right to purchase home for minor children of deceased.—Watkins v. Purnell, 62 S.W.2d 20, 187 Ark. 837.

(3) Administrator's expenditures even for purpose of maintenance and education of minors must be made under direction of court and in conformity with their station in life and value of estate.—Watkins v. Purnell, supra.

(4) However, such expenditures have frequently been allowed where they were reasonable, made in good faith, and suitable to the condition and circumstances of the children, and the estate was sufficient.—Darby v. Darby, 7 S.C.Eq. 451—24 C.J. p 238 note 84.

(5) Such expenditures have been allowed where there was no appointed guardian.—Glover v. Hill, 4 So. 613, 85 Ala. 41—24 C.J. p 238 note 85.

(6) Such expenditures have been allowed where the right to make them was vested in the executor by the will.—In re Van Houten, 3 N.J.Eq. 220, 29 Am.D. 707—24 C.J. p 238 note 86.

Traveling expenses of witness

The surrogate's court has no authority to direct payment of any disbursements from funds of estate to special guardian for unknown distributees for the purpose of bring-legatees or distributees,⁵⁵ beyond the statutory allowance to the widow and children,⁵⁶ except where such expenditures or payments are made under order of court or pursuant to statute or directions in the will.⁵⁷ As appears infra § 491, however, expenses bona fide and prudently incurred by the representative for the benefit of legatees or distributees may be duly set off against the legacies or distributive shares concerned therein.

§ 238. Miscellaneous Expenditures

- a. In general
- b. Insurance premiums
- c. Interest paid
- d. Judgments against representative
- e. Redemption of property

a. In General

The general rules have been applied to miscellaneous expenditures of various characters.

In addition to the expenditures considered supra §§ 223-237, a personal representative has been allowed credit for various other expenses such as the cost of advertising and printing done in the course of official duty;⁵⁸ money paid for newspapers to perpetuate the evidence of notice on the sale of real estate;⁵⁹ the cost of a copy of the inventory;⁶⁰ expenses incurred in special transactions which were prudent in protecting assets or settling debts of the estate;⁶¹ the expense of detaining a valuable witness as to a claim asserted against the estate;⁶² money paid for automobile hire for appraisers;⁶³ the expenses of the journey of decedent's wife or near relative for whom decedent sent during his last illness;⁶⁴ the expense of maintaining an office used exclusively for the business of the estate;⁶⁵ rent paid on an outstanding lease,⁶⁶ or, where necessary, for a safety deposit box,⁶⁷ or garage,⁶⁸ or pasture;⁶⁹ reasonable freight⁷⁰ and storage⁷¹ charges; money expended for necessary telephone service⁷² and for tools, machinery, and hardware purchased for decedent's farm with the approval of the court;⁷³ the cost of buying out the interest of tenants of decedent where necessary;⁷⁴ dues or assessments paid on bank⁷⁵ or building and loan⁷⁶ stock belonging to the estate; expenses incurred in selling estate property;⁷⁷ payments made for the preservation of the real property of the estate;⁷⁸ the expenses of ac-

Property transferred to corporation

Testator's real property transferred to wholly owned corporation, but after transfer managed in precisely same manner as when title stood in testator's name, could be considered as if title thereto had actually been in testator at time of his death; hence executors were entitled to allowance for payments made for reasonable preservation of such property.—In re Goldberg's Estate, 283 N. Y.S. 72, 157 Misc. 49, affirmed 291 quiring title to land which the executor was obliged to purchase at judicial sale in collecting a debt to the estate;⁷⁹ sums advanced for taxes, water rents, expenses of foreclosure, and insurance, on property foreclosed by him for the benefit of the estate;⁸⁰ expenses incurred in good faith in taking steps to recover foreign assets;⁸¹ expenses properly incurred in rightfully conducting the business of deceased;⁸² and expenses incurred in good faith, with the knowledge of, and without objection from, the heirs at law in securing growing fruit and crops and taking care of stock on decedent's farm.⁸³ Where an administrator is allowed by the probate court to keep the estate together, he should be allowed credit for the expense which he has necessarily incurred in cultivating the plantation and disposing of the crops,⁸⁴ and where an executor is required to account for the acts of his decedent as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, such executor is entitled to an allowance for payments made by his decedent to a contestant, who claimed as heir of such deceased husband.⁸⁵ An administratrix has also been held entitled to credit in her accounts for amounts paid by her during decedent's lifetime for the support of decedent and his family.⁸⁶

On the other hand, courts have refused to allow the personal representative credit for expenses incurred by him as a volunteer;⁸⁷ expenses incurred in continuing without authority the business of deceased, especially where nothing is realized from such continuance;⁸⁸ money paid out at the mere verbal request of decedent on his deathbed,⁸⁹ or for pew⁹⁰ or water⁹¹ rent, or for publishing in a county other than that provided by statute a notice of sale of real estate;⁹² expenses incurred on property while in another jurisdiction;⁹³ money expended for the representative's own individual benefit,⁹⁴ or for liquors used at an auction sale of assets;⁹⁵ the costs of maintaining decedent's home after the funeral period;⁹⁶ money expended in carrying out a void trust,⁹⁷ or in connection with insurance policies forming no part of the estate assets;⁹⁸ assessments paid on bank stock held by the estate merely

Property specifically devised

Where real property had been specifically devised to testator's widow as first charge on estate of testator, but at time of his death the possibility existed that as result of action pending against him such real property might be subject to liability, executor acted properly in considering the real property as part of the estate pending final determination of the action and in obtaining authority from court to make expenditure for upkeep and maintenance of the property.—In re Ledyard's Estate, 21 N.Y.S.2d 860, affirmed In re Ledyard's Will, 20 N.Y.S.2d 1006, 259 App.Div. 892, reargument denied 21 N.Y.S.2d 890, 259 App.Div. 1029, and 24 N.Y.S.2d 780, 261 App.Div. 827.

as collateral;⁹⁰ the expense of surveying a line between the property of deceased and that of an adjoining proprietor;¹ the administrator's expenses preliminary to applying for letters;² or his time and money expended while endeavoring to effect a private settlement with the heirs.³

Buying off contestants. It has been held that an executor has no right to buy off contestants of the will and charge the expense against the estate,⁴ but there is also authority for the view that an amount paid to contestants of the will as a compromise in settlement of the will contest is chargeable as part of the expenses of administration.⁵

b. Insurance Premiums

In a proper case a personal representative may be entitled to credit for premiums paid on insurance policies.

The right of a personal representative to credit in his account for premiums paid on insurance policies depends on the facts in the particular case including the character of the policies and the kind of insurance involved.⁶ He is not entitled, of course, to credit for the payment of assessments on a policy of insurance in which his decedent had no interest and in which his estate has none;⁷ but where, in the exercise of good faith and reasonable prudence, he insures personal property, as assets of the estate, against fire, he is entitled to reimbursement for the premium paid,⁸ and while he is usually not entitled to an allowance for premiums paid for insurance on the real property, since that belongs rather to the heirs or devisees,⁹ yet where he has direction and control of the property, or reasonably expects that an insufficiency of the personal assets to pay the debts of the estate may render a sale of the real estate necessary, the insurance by him of the buildings may be prudent and an allowance therefor justified.¹⁰ The court may, however, refuse to allow credit for money paid for insurance where the amount paid is so greatly out of proportion to the amount realized by a sale of the property as to indicate that the payment was imprudent and reckless.¹¹

Life insurance. An administratrix is not entitled to credit for payments during decedent's lifetime of premiums on life insurance policies of decedent in which she was the beneficiary;¹² but an administrator who has acted in good faith and with reasonable prudence may be allowed credit for amounts paid as premiums on a life insurance policy held as collateral to a note given to decedent, although there was ultimately a loss to the estate.¹³

c. Interest Paid

A personal representative is entitled to credit for interest properly paid by him on obligations of the estate.

As a general rule, an executor or administrator is entitled to credit in his account for interest properly paid by him on obligations of the estate.¹⁴ He is not entitled to credit, however, for payments of

d. Judgments against Representative

Where a creditor of the estate recovers and collects a judgment against the personal representative, the latter will be allowed credit for the amount thereof if he acted with reasonable prudence and was not guilty of improper conduct.

Where a creditor of the estate has recovered and collected a judgment against the executor or administrator, the representative will be allowed credit in his accounts for the amount thereof, including costs, when it appears that he acted within the rule of reasonable prudence and discretion and was not guilty of negligence, bad faith, or other improper conduct;¹⁷ but it is otherwise where the circumstances indicate bad faith or culpable remissness on the part of the representative.¹⁸

e. Redemption of Property

A personal representative may be entitled to credit in his account for expenditures made in good faith and with due prudence in redeeming mortgaged or otherwise encumbered property.

Where the personal representative honestly and in the exercise of due prudence and diligence redeems mortgaged or otherwise encumbered property, the value of which is fairly in excess of the mortgage debt, he may be allowed credit for the outlay in his accounts,¹⁹ but outlays because of his own bad judgment or remissness of duty and without benefit to the estate are not thus favored.²⁰

G. INDIVIDUAL INTEREST IN TRANSACTIONS

§ 239. In General

An executor or administrator may not acquire individual interests inconsistent with his duties or make a personal profit from his dealings with the property of the estate; but the rule may be relaxed as to transactions in good faith, and beneficial, or not prejudicial, to the estate.

An executor or administrator cannot be allowed to acquire or promote individual interests inconsistent with the representative capacity he sustains for the benefit of the estate, or to make a personal profit out of his dealings with the property of the estate.²¹

Employment of self

A contract for compensation, to be paid by the administrator of an estate of deceased person for services to be performed by himself and his partner as attorneys in an action to be commenced by them for damages for the wrongful death of decedent, is in violation of the trust reposed in the administrator, and cannot be enforced.—*Judy v. Lease to self

It was no ground for objection to the final account of an administrator that he had applied to be allowed to lease certain land belonging to the estate and had profited personally by the administration, where, under the will and by agreement of the parties, he was entitled to the possession of such property.—In re Adin's Estate, 202 P. 262, 117 Wash. 693.

Purchase of evidence of debt

The fact that executor purchases chose in action, evidencing indebtedness by testator, together with deed to land in which beneficiaries have interest given to secure the debt, is not, without more, evidence of fraud, and, if bona fide, is not void.—Waldrop v. Chandler, 118 S.E. 745, 155 Ga. 829.

Executor, who by will was authorized to act as his own counsel, and who, as attorney, negotiated loan by estate to third party, which was advantageous to estate, could keep fee paid him by such third party pursuant to contract made in good faith.—Koteen v. Bickers, 177 S.E. 904, 163 Va. 676.

Advancing money; taking mortgage

Executor or administrator may advance money to estate which he represents, to be used in payment of pressing claims against estate, or in payment of expenses of administration or fees allowed executor, and may mortgage property of estate to himself, without violating statute prohibiting him from being interested in "sale" of property of estate.—Corporation of America v. Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n, 46 P.2d 262, 7 Cal.App.2d 470.

Payment of decedent's debt

Where intestate, to secure indebtedness, pledged trust estate, corpus of which was to be turned over to wife estate suffered no loss from the acts of the representative, the rule has not been applied.³⁹ An executor who without authority sells corporate stock belonging to the estate is liable only for the loss then resulting to the estate, and legatees cannot hold him to account as trustee for profits made by him some years subsequently in the repurchase and sale of such stock.⁴⁰ The fact that the estate included stock in a corporation in which the executor individually also owned stock does not affect the rights of the executor unless it is shown that by reason of the two holdings he was able to achieve a result, in relation to the corporation, which would have been impossible otherwise;⁴¹ but, where the executor and another were both left stock, the purchase of additional stock by the executor from a third person, so as to give him control of the corporation, was held not a breach of trust.⁴²

While a representative cannot take an assignment of a mortgage on his decedent's land and exercise the power of sale therein to foreclose to the injury of the heirs,⁴³ he may, with his own funds, purchase and take an assignment of a note outstanding against his decedent, and avail himself of any securities held by the creditors, without using them to the prejudice of other creditors or the heirs.⁴⁴ While a representative is not entitled to retain assets of the estate at their inventoried value,⁴⁵ he may retain assets at a fair rate of valuation of which the appraisement is prima facie proof,⁴⁶ although he cannot make a profit by retaining them at a price lower than offered by others and refused by him.⁴⁷

§ 240. Transactions with Heirs, Etc.

Since an executor or administrator stands in a trust relation to the beneficiaries of the estate, he may not profit from transactions with them to their prejudice; but such transactions have been held not void, but voidable.

An administrator stands in a trust relation toward those interested in the estate of the intestate, including the widow and heirs, as far as transactions between him and them are concerned,⁴⁸ and equity will not permit a person who is, or is about to become, an administrator to profit from his transactions with the heirs to their prejudice.⁴⁹ However, it has also been held that a transaction between an executor or administrator and the persons he represents is not void,⁵⁰ but is voidable, provided a want of equity and of fair dealing appears in the transon intestate's death, wife who paid the indebtedness, and was ten months later made administratrix and charged the indebtedness against the estate, could not be surcharged for corpus of trust which she received, on theory that one occupying position of trust cannot deal to her own advantage with trust estate.—In re Zahriskie's Estate, 287 N.Y.S. 249, 159 Misc. 199.

39. Agreement to repurchase stock

An executor may transfer at par, in settlement of a legacy, stock that is worth less than par, and at the same time agree to repurchase the stock later at an advanced price on his personal account.—Weymouth v. Goodwin, 75 A. 61, 105 Me. 510.

Payment of debts

(1) A representative may properly apply the assets of the estate to the payment of a debt of his decedent in its due order, although he is individually liable as decedent's surety.—Rowland v. Cocke, 2 J.J.Marsh., Ky., 79.

(2) Representative may even pay such debt where he, in his individual capacity, is the principal debtor and decedent is the surety.—Shelton v. Carpenter, 60 Ala. 201.

Employment of one executor

Executors' employment of one of themselves to manage realty of and collect rent due corporation, all stock of which was held by estate, was proper.—In re Schlesinger's Estate, 256 N.Y.S. 381, 143 Misc. 275.

action,⁵¹ and provided the beneficiaries act to avoid the transaction with reasonable promptness.⁵² It has been held that an administrator may properly act as an attorney in fact for a beneficiary of the estate.⁵³

§ 241. Rights of Person Dealing with Representative

Whether a transaction between a third person and a representative acting for his individual benefit will be sustained against the interest of the estate depends on whether the third person acted with notice of the representative's breach of trust.

Transactions by a representative, such as a sale or pledge of assets, entered into for purposes other than the due discharge of his duty as fiduciary will not be sustained against the interests of the estate, where the person with whom he dealt had notice of his bad faith or breach of trust, and in such case the transaction may be set aside and restitution enforced;⁵⁴ and a transferee having reasonable ground for suspecting that there was a conversion is answerable for the assets.⁵⁵ On the other hand, a third person who, in dealing with the representative, acted in good faith and without notice of the representative's bad faith, and parted with consideration, will be protected in the transaction.⁵⁶

H. WASTE, CONVERSION, OR EMBEZZLEMENT OF ASSETS

§ 242. Liability and Extent Thereof in General

- a. In general
- b. Extent of liability

a. In General

An executor or administrator is personally liable for waste, or conversion or similar loss to the estate, in some instances even where the misconduct is that of a third person; and a third person may be liable for the misconduct of the representative, where such third person knowingly acquired the property or participated in the misconduct.

An executor or administrator is personally liable to those who are interested in the estate as heirs, distributees, creditors, or otherwise,⁵⁷ for waste,⁵⁸ or for conversion,⁵⁹ misapplication,⁶⁰ or embezzlement⁶¹ of the assets of the estate.

In addition to their remedy against the representative personally for waste or conversion, the beneficiaries of the estate may also maintain an action on his official bond, see § 961 infra, and, as appears below, may hold third persons liable, in a proper case. Where statutes so provide, the representative may be subject to penalties for conversion, embezzlement, and kindred offenses.⁶²

Nature of liability. It has been held that the liability of an executor or administrator for waste

or conversion is not contractual within the meaning of statutes conferring jurisdiction of actions on contracts express or implied;⁶³ but the obligation of an executor to an injured legatee, where the executor fails to obey the will as regards disposition of property, has been held to possess all the essentials of a debt.⁶⁴

Liability for acts of others. An executor or administrator may be liable for waste or conversion, even though it is committed by another, where he has acquiesced therein;⁶⁵ and, if a representative enters into any arrangement which limits or surrenders his control over property, such act renders him liable in the event of loss, notwithstanding he may otherwise not have been guilty of negligence or bad faith.⁶⁶ An executor or administrator is liable for a devastavit committed by his wife during coverture,⁶⁷ and, if a devastavit is committed by the husband of an executrix, and she survives him, she is chargeable with the loss suffered by the estate.⁶⁸ An executor or administrator is not, however, chargeable with, or responsible for, the acts of his

Whether an executor or administrator is liable for the embezzlement or other misconduct of an attorney or agent employed by him depends on whether the representative acted within the scope of his powers and with good faith and ordinary prudence;⁷⁰ but it has also been held, without reference to good faith or prudence, that a representative is liable for loss or misappropriation of funds by an agent or attorney.⁷¹

Liability of third persons. Property held by an executor or administrator, being held in trust, may, where misappropriated, be followed by the beneficiaries of the estate into the hands of third persons if it can be traced;⁷² at least where such third persons have notice that the disposition by the representative is fraudulent;⁷³ and a third person will be liable, with the representative, for the loss resulting from a devastavit or conversion, where he participates therein or takes advantage thereof knowingly,⁷⁴ but not where he acted in good faith and

Surety as participant

If surety, on bond of administrator of estate of insured, with knowledge or notice that administrator as administrator of estate of beneficiary of life policies, commingled policy proceeds with moneys of estate of insured, participated in wrongful act of administrator in depositing such moneys in bank which later closed, surety would be liable for loss not on theory of being surety on bond, but because of surety's actual participation in wrong as joint tort-feasor.—Boutwell v. Drinkard, 160 So. 349, 230 Ala. 212.

Repayment of improper loan

However, where executor loans funds of estate to firm of which he is a member, and from time to time draws out moneys which are charged to him in account, and on subsequent settlement with firm it is agreed that money so drawn out shall be apwithout notice.⁷⁵ Where the representative's acts were not a violation of his trust, those who aided him in such acts committed no wrong and are not liable for losses which may have resulted.⁷⁶

The effect of the rule that third persons may be liable for waste or conversion is not to limit the obligations of the representative, who remains primarily and individually liable,⁷⁷ but to give the beneficiaries of the estate an election to charge the representative for the loss or to pursue their remedy against the third person.⁷⁸

Presumptions as to disposition. Where a representative, having the power of appointment over a certain fund, misappropriates securities of the estate, it will be presumed that he used first the fund over which he had the power of appointment, and the property which he could dispose of by appointment would, to the extent of the misappropriation, be lessened.⁷⁹ Similarly, where an executor who was also a devisee had the power to sell the property, and improperly sold part of it without making any provision for the other devisees, the amount realized by the sale will be deemed to have been used to satisfy his claim as devisee, so that he could assert no further claim.⁸⁰

Lien on representative's property. There is no specific lien on the property of the representative to make good his waste or embezzlement.⁸¹

b. Extent of Liability

In general, the liability of a representative for waste, conversion, or other loss of property through his fault is for the value of the property at the time of the misconduct, plus interest.

The actual value of the assets at the time of their waste, conversion, embezzlement, or misappropriation, computed in lawful money, is usually the measure of the liability of the executor or administrator who was at fault,⁸² and in case of conversion the representative may be charged with the highest value which can properly be placed on the property.⁸³ In general, the representative is liable for interest on the amount misappropriated, wasted, or commingled.⁸⁴ It has been held that the limit of liability, in the absence of a showing that the representative made a larger profit, is the return of the principal sum not accounted for with legal inpled to payment of loan, devisees are bound by this adjustment, although partners knew that loan was of trust property, and on firm books it was credited to estate.—Sherburne v. Goodwin, 44 N.H. 271.

Duty of third person

The only duty owed to an estate by third persons negotiating with administratrix for exchange of decedent's stock for other stock was to refrain from interference with the assets which they knew or should have known might cause injury to the estate.—Stark v. National City Bank of New York, supra.

Inducing exchange of securities

Where banking corporation, formed to acquire control of predecessor banks, and another bank induced administratrix to exercise stockholders' privilege of exchanging decedent's stock in predecessor banks, which were not sold on the market, for equivalent stock in new corporation, and the new stock decreased in value, banks which induced the exchange were not liable to administratrix for having participated in wasting the estate's assets, in absence of showing of bad faith.—Stark v. National City Bank of New York, supra.

terest compounded annually.⁸⁵

Where the representative by his misappropriation makes precise ascertainment of the value of the property misappropriated impossible, he will be held accountable in the highest degree.⁸⁶ Where decedent and his administrator each owned half the stock of a corporation, the funds of which the administrator misappropriated, the estate was injured, if the corporation was solvent, to the extent of one half of the total of the misappropriations.⁸⁷

Proof that an administrator has converted to his own use a certain sum from the assets of the estate does not, in the absence of an accounting, create any presumption that he has not converted a greater sum.⁸⁸

Conversion of business. In the case of the conversion of a business, the representative is chargeable with the value of the business, interest thereon, and the profits made during the period of conversion;⁸⁹ but he is not chargeable with the gross receipts, since he must be allowed the expense of conducting the business.⁹⁰ The representative is also chargeable with the value of the good will of the business;⁹¹ and, where an administratrix completely took over a business for her own use, it was held that she would be surcharged with a sum sufficient to pay decedent's creditors.⁹²

Penalties. Under statutes to that effect, a representative whose misconduct has caused the loss may be subject to a penalty exceeding the value of the property, as where he is made liable for double its value.⁹³

§ 243. Waste

Waste is any mismanagement of the estate of a decedent, or other breach of duty resulting in loss, by an executor or administrator. In a proper case a representative may be restrained from committing waste.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted and cited with approval, a waste of assets, or devastavit, is any mismanagement of the estate and effects of a decedent, or any squandering or misapplication of the assets, contrary to the duty imposed on the executor or administrator,⁹⁴ and consists of any act, omission, or mismanagement by reason of which the estate suffers loss.⁹⁵ In general, the particular method by which the representative has improperly diverted the funds is immaterial.⁹⁶

Various particular acts or omissions by the representative of a deceased have been held to constitute waste,⁹⁷ such as using the property of the estate for an unauthorized purpose or in an unauthorized manner;⁹⁸ or for his own purposes;⁹⁹ purchasing property of the estate for himself;¹ selling property for a price lower than that obtainable;² or on improper terms, as on credit;³ transferring assets of the estate without consideration;⁴ failure to collect assets⁵ or to apply them to debts, in consequence of which failure the land in the hands of an heir or devisee is subjected to the debts;⁶ negligently permitting real estate to be sacrificed for the satisfaction of liens which there is sufficient personal estate to discharge;⁷ paying debts of an inferior degree with notice that there are outstanding debts entitled to priority;⁸ unless sufficient assets are retained to pay the latter;⁹ paying in full a debt which has no lien or priority, to the exclusion of others, when the estate is insolvent;¹⁰ paying claims which, by the exercise of proper diligence, the representative might have ascertained to be unjust and illegal;¹¹ voluntarily paying or assenting to legacies when there are outstanding debts, although the representative is ignorant of them, where the estate proves insufficient to pay creditors in full;¹² paying legacies or distributive shares without requiring refunding bonds, to the prejudice of creditors;¹³ or wrongfully using one's power as administrator to get control of the intestate's business at less than its full value, and failing to account for some of the assets of the estate.¹⁴

Applying funds to guardianship

One who is at the same time administrator and guardian commits waste by applying funds of the estate to the interests of the guard-

On the other hand, where the executor or administrator acts within the scope of his authority, his acts do not constitute waste;¹⁵ and, where the representative employs the assets in good faith to con-ianship.—Stillman v. Young, 16 Ill. 318.

Disobedience of court order or judgment serve the interests of the estate, he will not be liable if his action does not result beneficially.¹⁶ It has even been held that there can be no devastavit which will sustain an action against an administrator until he has violated an order of the probate court to pay creditors.¹⁷ It has been held not necessarily to be waste that the representative paid interest on obligations of decedent, although he might have avoided such payment;¹⁸ nor is it waste that he failed to put the estate funds out at interest, but kept them in a commercial bank,¹⁹ that he accepted a salary from a corporation in which the estate was the majority stockholder,²⁰ or that he expended money in a reasonable effort to save property of his intestate situated in another state.²¹ Where the administrator permitted a caretaker to use furniture belonging to decedent and the furniture was damaged in an amount less than the costs of properly caring for the furniture otherwise, there was no devastavit.²²

Evidence. A devastavit will not be presumed,²³ but must be clearly established by the evidence.²⁴

Rank of claims for waste. It has been held that a creditor holding a specialty debt due from an intestate and coming against the estate of his administrator, on account of a devastavit, can only take equally with such administrator's simple contract creditors, while his sureties must make up the balance.²⁵

Restraining waste. A representative may be restrained from committing waste²⁶ or ruining the estate by collusion with pretended creditors,²⁷ provided, however, there is satisfactory proof of such actual misconduct or threatened misconduct as will render the property and estate in his hands in his charge and custody likely to suffer loss and be jeopardized by its further continuance under his control and management.²⁸

§ 244. Conversion

An executor or administrator may be guilty of conversion where he uses the assets of the estate for himself, or has them transferred to himself, or otherwise uses or disposes of the property for an unauthorized purpose or in an unauthorized manner.

ested;³¹ uses the property of the estate for an unauthorized purpose or in an unauthorized manner;³² sells or disposes of property of the estate without authority;³³ sells property of decedent and purchases it himself;³⁴ withdraws money which had been deposited in bank to the credit of decedent for a specific purpose, but which decedent had refused to accept;³⁵ or refuses to allow a domestic servant, to whom the testator has orally given certain articles of personal property, causa mortis, to remove them from the house of the testator.³⁶ The formation of a corporation by the representative out of a partnership of which decedent was a partner has been held to amount to a conversion of the estate's partnership interest.³⁷

On the other hand, particular acts of a representative have been held not to constitute conversion,³⁸ such as merely asserting ownership of assets rightfully in his possession, although the claim is erroneous;³⁹ retaining possession of property, in the absence of a demand therefor,⁴⁰ unless it is manifest that a demand would have been useless;⁴¹ taking securities in his own name for debts due the estate, where he had no fraudulent intent;⁴² using property of the estate where he married decedent's widow and there are infant children of her former marriage;⁴³ or failing to pay a debt due by him to the estate, which is charged against him in his accounts.⁴⁴ Since one having a half interest in notes distributed to heirs under an order of distribution became a tenant in common with the distributees, the mere act of the administrator in turning over the notes to them was not a conversion thereof.⁴⁵

§ 245. Mingling Trust and Personal Funds or Property

In general, an executor or administrator is personally liable for property of the estate which he has mingled with his own or other property so as to render the properties indistinguishable.

An executor or administrator should preserve the funds and property of decedent's estate distinct from his own so that such assets may be known and readily identified;⁴⁶ and, if he mingles the trust prop-

Collecting securities and reinvesting

Where testatrix bequeathed to testamentary trustees personal estate, consisting of bonds and mortgages, which was not necessary to pay debts, the act of the executor in collecting such securities and reinvesting the funds constituted a conversion, and rendered him liable to account for the value of the original assets to the trustees in cash.—Matter of Ryer, 88 N.Y.S. 52, 94 App. Div. 449, affirmed 72 N.E. 1150, 180 N.Y. 532.

Permitting unauthorized use

Administrator's refusal to sell personality of husband's estate, and permitting use thereof in operation of deceased husband's farm, constituted conversion rendering estate liable to wife for property converted.—Meyers' Adm'r v. Meyers, 50 S.W.2d 81, 244 Ky. 248.

One cannot be surcharged for appropriation of good will of business where business is shown to be one to which good will does not attach.—In re Bandler's Estate, 15 N.Y.S. 2d 307, 172 Misc. 433.

Payment of funeral expenses

A husband's use of property of his wife's estate, before his appointment as her administrator, to pay reasonable funeral expenses for deceased was held not alienation or embezzlement.—In re Wagner's Estate, 62 P.2d 1186, 178 Okl. 384.

Temporary use of property

A representative taking property of the estate into his possession and using it in connection with his own property without an order of court, for part of the time, and declaring that he intended to continue such use until decedent's debts should be paid, when he would give the entire estate to decedent's widow and child, was held not to constitute conversion.—Morgan v. Nelson, 43 Ala. 586.

Permitting widow to retain possession

erty with his own or with other property, so that the two are indistinguishable, he becomes personally liable;⁴⁷ and it has been held that beneficiaries may at their option elect to hold him accountable as for conversion in doing so.⁴⁸ While, in case of loss, the representative is liable without regard to the question whether the loss itself was caused by any fault of his,⁴⁹ there is an inclination to respect innocent motive and the absence of intent or opportunity to make an individual profit, where due prudence was exercised under all the circumstances, so as to relieve the representative in such case from strict liability as though for conversion;⁵⁰ and it has even been held that mere commingling does not make a representative guilty of misconduct, where he never used any of the funds for his own purpose, and accounted for all of them.⁵¹ Where an executor sells, for a gross sum, goods of which a part belong to him and a part to the estate, money paid to him on account of such sale will be presumed to have been paid on account of the property belonging to the estate.⁵²

§ 246. Discharge from Liability

The distribution of the estate does not relieve the representative from liability for a devastavit; but consent to, or concurrence in, a representative's act precludes one from charging it to be a devastavit.

The fact that a representative has distributed the estate of decedent does not relieve him from liability to a creditor who sues him for a devastavit within the period fixed by statute.⁵³ One who consents to, or concurs in, an act done by a representative cannot charge such act to be a devastavit,⁵⁴ but the assent of the guardian ad litem of an infant legatee or distributee will not discharge the representative from liability.⁵⁵

An administratrix who allows her husband to receive and convert to his own use the funds of an infant next of kin is not discharged from liability therefor on the subsequent appointment of the husband as guardian of such infant, but is equally liable with such guardian.⁵⁶

I. LOSS OR DEPRECIATION OF ASSETS

§ 247. Liability and Extent Thereof in General

Executors and administrators are chargeable with the loss or depreciation of the assets of the estate only when such loss has been caused by their bad faith or lack of due diligence or prudence.

Executors and administrators are not insurers, nor will they be chargeable with the loss or depreciation of the assets where they have acted in good faith and with due prudence and diligence in the care and management of the estate,⁵⁷ but they are liable for losses which are the consequence of bad

Statutory prohibition

(1) Statutory prohibition against mingling of estate funds is rule of conduct intended to prevent diversion or fraud, which executors are bound to obey and which cannot be weakened or nullified by judicial interpretation.—In re Grossman's Estate, 283 N.Y.S. 323, 157 Misc. 164, affirmed In re Fribourg, 294 N.Y.S. 942, 250 App.Div. 503.

(2) Under statute requiring fiduciaries to keep funds of decedents' estates separate, executors were unauthorized to carry securities of estate in name or custody of a copartnership organized to handle securities possessed by corporate executor in its fiduciary capacity, notwithstanding testatrix' will authorized executors to carry securities in name of executors' nominee.—In re Harris' Estate, 9 N.Y.S.2d 508, 169 Misc. 943.

(3) That executors, who carried securities of estate of decedent in name or custody of copartnership organized to handle securities possessed by corporate executor in its fiduciary capacity, acted in good faith did not authorize the executors' departure from provision of statute requiring funds of decedents' estates to be kept separate by fiduciaries.—In re Harris' Estate, supra.

(2) However, it has also been held that doctrine of confusion of goods does not apply so as to cause the representative to forfeit his own property in cases of mingling.—Matter of Mullon, 26 N.Y.S. 683, 74 Hun 358, affirmed 39 N.E. 821, 145 N.Y. 98.

acted in good faith and with such prudence and diligence as to relieve him from liability for loss,⁶⁴ and it has been held that such a determination must be made by the probate court.⁶⁵

In case funds of the estate become worthless through depreciation of the legal currency, the usual standard of good faith and due diligence should apply;⁶⁶ but an executrix is not subject to surcharge for losses incurred as life tenant.⁶⁷

An executor or administrator is prima facie liable only for such assets as come into his possession,⁶⁸ and only to those to whom he owes a duty,⁶⁹ but he may be charged with the value of property lost through his negligence, although he never had possession of it;⁷⁰ and an administrator may be held accountable to the estate for assets wasted or lost through his acts from the time of decedent's death to the time of the issuance of letters.⁷¹

Extent of liability. The liability of an executor or administrator for the loss of assets is measured by the detriment sustained by the estate,⁷² which is the value of the property at the date of the loss.⁷³ Accordingly, where an executor has been held personally liable for losses from his investments of trust funds on insufficient security, and he has obtained for the estate title to the property taken as security, the legatees must quitclaim to him their claim to such property as a condition precedent to his paying the losses.⁷⁴

§ 248. Cause of Loss or Depreciation

- a. In general
- b. Failure to sell or delay in selling

a. In General

A personal representative who acts in good faith and with due care is not, as a general rule, personally liable for loss occasioned to the estate by theft, war, fire, or other casualty, or by the misconduct or negligence of his agents or servants.

The effect of war or public authority exercised de facto is that of vis major, and a personal representative who exercises good faith and such due care and diligence as the circumstances exact should not be charged personally for a loss to the estate thereby occasioned.⁷⁵ He is not liable for the destruction of property of the estate by fire or other casualty if he took such precautions to avoid it as a prudent man would take in regard to his own property;⁷⁶ and he is not generally responsible for the loss resulting from the stealing of property or funds of the estate,⁷⁷ unless the theft is attributable to his own negligence.⁷⁸

While the representative has been held liable for loss resulting from the negligence or fault of agents or servants employed by him,⁷⁹ and there can be no doubt of such liability where there was concurrent negligence or fault on the part of the representative,⁸⁰ the generally accepted view is that the necessity of employing agents or attorneys in the collection of assets involves the risk of loss to the estate by their misconduct, negligence, or nonfeasance,

Negligent surrender of control to attorney

An executor, negligently surrendering entire control and management of estate to attorney, who converted portion of assets thereof, was responsible for resulting loss, so as to authorize recovery of amount thereof from his estate after his death.—In re Remsen, 7 N.Y.S.2d 350, 255 App.Div. 810, reargument denied 8 N.Y.S.2d 998, 255 App.Div. 974.

and if a loss be sustained from such cause the executor or administrator is not liable if he exercised due prudence in the selection of the agent or attorney and his conduct was not otherwise negligent or improper.⁸¹ There is authority that, when an executor enters into any arrangement with the surety on his bond which surrenders or limits his control over trust funds, he is guarantor of the funds irrespective of his motives, or of whether his surrender of control was the cause of the loss.⁸²

Failure to deposit or safeguard. The representative should be held liable for a loss caused by his failure to deposit or safeguard funds or property, as by failure to insure, where he has been lacking in good faith or ordinary prudence, but not otherwise.⁸³

b. Failure to Sell or Delay in Selling

(1) In general

(2) Securities

(1) In General

A representative who retains property or assets of the estate instead of selling is not liable for loss or depreciation occurring during such retention, if he acted properly and prudently.

A personal representative who retains property or assets of the estate instead of selling it or them is not, if he acted properly and prudently in so doing, liable for loss or depreciation in value which takes place while such property is retained;⁸⁴ but it is otherwise where he acted imprudently or improperly, or exceeded his powers in retaining such property.⁸⁵ It has been held that a more liberal view of a representative's discretion in converting decedent's assets into cash will be taken as regards legatees than as regards creditors,⁸⁶ and that a representative who has acted in good faith and, by retaining certain assets of the estate, has realized large profits and eventually disposed of a portion for more than the inventoried value of the whole, will not be charged with losses on another portion because of a technical violation of his duty in not disposing of them.⁸⁷

Loss in consequence of the death of live stock in the hands of an executor or administrator, resulting from natural causes, is not chargeable to him, where there was no dereliction of duty on his part in retaining possession of them until they died, instead of selling them.⁸⁸ The same rule has been applied to slaves.⁸⁹

(2) Securities

A personal representative is not liable for a depreciation in the value of securities which occurs while they are being retained by him after they could have been sold, unless such retention was in violation of a duty to sell because of their speculative or nonlegal nature, or was, under the particular circumstances, negligent or imprudent.

A personal representative is liable for losses incurred by his refusal or negligent failure to sell securities which are declining in value or which,

Business rendered worthless by legislation

An executor cannot be held liable for loss by reason of depreciation in value of a liquor business which he failed to sell, where it appears that he had acted in good faith and on advice of counsel in trying to realize the highest possible price, and that before he could sell federal legislation rendered the business worthless. —In re Murnaghan's Estate, 107 A. 886, 264 Pa. 520, followed in 107 A. 888, 264 Pa. 523.

Absence of market for stock
Va.—Harris v. Citizens Bank & Trust Co., 200 S.E. 652, 172 Va. 111.

There is authority that a personal representative is not liable for a failure to sell which was due to an honest mistake of judgment,⁹⁶ at least where the provisions of the will authorized him to retain the securities;⁹⁷ and testamentary provisions may, indeed, protect the executor from being surcharged even for negligence in retaining the securities, unless there is proof of fraud or gross negligence.⁹⁸ Even when there is a duty to sell, the representative must be allowed as much time as is reasonable under the circumstances of the particular case;⁹⁹ and the court should be lenient toward a representative who, in time of economic distress, holds securities of the estate against a falling market.¹ In determining the prudence of his conduct, the court should keep in mind the distinction between those securities which came to him as part of the estate, and those which have been purchased by him.²

Extent of liability. The personal representative is liable for the actual loss to the estate resulting from negligent failure to sell securities;³ and it

Distinction between executors and trustees

The rule with respect to holding nonlegal securities owned by decedent, which governs executors and other personal representatives with their presumably short-duration trusts, should be more liberal than that governing trustees fixed with the duty of managing an estate during a long period of years.—In re Taylor's Estate, 121 A. 310, 277 Pa. 518, 37 A.L.R. 553.

Losses occurring before executors qualified

Executors cannot be surcharged for a shrinkage in the value of securities which occurred before they were qualified, and before they had the right to ask leave of the court for directions in reference to such securities.—Goldshorrough v. De Witt, 189 A. 226, 171 Md. 225.

Failure of executors to exercise reasonable care to sell testator's stock did not render executors liable to widow who acquiesced in or actually encouraged retention of securities.—In re Garvin's Will, 177 N.E. 24, 256 N.Y. 518, modifying 242 N.Y. S. 830, 229 App.Div. 803.

Deduction of estate tax

Payment by executors to infant beneficiary on account of executors' negligence in failing to sell stock is confined to amount infant would have received if stock had been sold in exercise of reasonable care, less proportionate part of estate tax.—In re Garvin's Will, 177 N.E. 24, 256

has been held that his liability is measured by the difference between their inventory value and the amount received by him,⁴ or the difference between what the securities would have brought had he exercised his business judgment, and what they actually sold for.⁵ There is authority that where the executor has improperly retained securities, of which some have appreciated and others have depreciated in value, the beneficiaries may accept the benefit of the appreciation and still hold the representative liable for the loss on the other securities.⁶

§ 249. Grounds for Relief from Liability

An executor or administrator may be relieved of liability for losses by the fact that he acted with the approval of the heirs or distributees; and the fact that he acted under advice of counsel is in his favor.

Where an executor or administrator has acted in good faith, and his course of conduct has been requested, authorized, or assented to by the heirs or distributees, with knowledge of all the material facts, this may excuse him from any liability to them for resulting losses,⁷ even though he has deviated from the line of his duties.⁸ Thus, one who consents to the retention, by the personal representative, of securities which should be sold may be precluded from charging the representative for losses resulting from such retention.⁹

Advice of counsel. The fact that a representative acted under advice of counsel, in good faith, is entitled to great weight in his favor,¹⁰ and it has been held to relieve him of liability;¹¹ but other authorities regard the fact as not, in and of itself, sufficient conclusively to excuse him, as where there is a lack of due care on his part.¹²

§ 250. In General

A tort committed by an executor or administrator is ordinarily committed by him as an individual, and does not render the estate liable.

tortious act;¹⁴ and the rule is the same whether the injury results from intentional wrong or negligence.¹⁵ Whether the executor or administrator may have indemnity out of the estate is of no concern to third persons.¹⁶

Property or money actually received by the estate as assets through the representative's tortious conduct may sometimes be reached by the injured person;¹⁷ and an executor is not personally liable for a tort committed as an incident to the carrying out of express instructions in the will.¹⁸

The advice of counsel does not impart the quality of legality to an executor's tortious intent and purpose.¹⁹

§ 251. Fraud

An executor or administrator who practices fraud is answerable personally, and the estate is not liable, although recourse may be had against it if it benefits.

The estate of decedent is not liable for the fraud or false representations of the executor or administrator, as in the sale of property of the estate, but the representative who practices the fraud is answerable personally therefor to the injured person.²⁰ The executor or administrator in the performance of his duties is, however, bound to act fairly and not fraudulently, and the estate cannot be permitted to derive any unjust or unconscionable advantage from his unauthorized or fraudulent misbehavior;²¹ and where it appears that property fraudulently obtained was treated or used as assets of the estate, or that the estate received some benefit from his conduct, recourse may be had accordingly to a corresponding extent.²² If the fraud is practiced on or at the expense of the estate or those interested therein, the representative must of course respond therefor individually,²³ but dealings between an executor and a legatee are not necessarily fraudulent,²⁴ although, as appears in § 240 supra, they will be closely scrutinized.

The representative is entitled to the presumption of good faith in the discharge of his duties, and fraud, like any other tort, ought to be proved against him.²⁵ It has been said that no matter how many

§ 252. Title and Authority in General

- a. General rule
- b. Effect of testamentary provisions
- c. Statutory modifications of rule

a. General Rule

Subject to certain exceptions, as a general rule an executor or administrator has no interest in, title to, or control over the realty of his decedent.

Subject to certain exceptions and modifications discussed in this and the following subdivision of this section, as a general rule an executor or administrator, as such, has no interest in, title to, or control over the realty of his decedent,²⁷ but the title to all real property of decedent vests in his heirs or devisees, subject to the necessities of administration.²⁸

Accordingly an executor or administrator cannot release or give rights in the land,²⁹ preserve or impair homestead rights,³⁰ release a right of way over the land,³¹ bind the heirs by consenting to a proceeding for laying out a highway over the land,³² create a lien on the land by erecting buildings thereon,³³ dedicate land to public use,³⁴ make a statutory plat,³⁵ ratify a deed executed by decedent when insane,³⁶ recover the surplus realized at a tax sale, even though he was in possession,³⁷

b. Effect of Testamentary Provisions

The testator may, by his will, give to the executor such interest in or control over realty as he sees proper; but the interest of the executor in this respect is limited by the terms of the will, and a direction to sell the realty generally vests in the executor only a power of sale.

The testator may, by his will, give to his executor such authority and control over real estate as he sees proper,⁴¹ and whether the executor takes title to, or an interest in, the realty under the will is usually a question of the testator's intention.⁴² The authority of an executor in this respect is strictly limited by the terms of the will;⁴³ he takes only such interest in the realty as is given to him expressly or by necessary implication.⁴⁴

It has been held that authority given by will to an executor to rent, lease, manage, or control the real estate by necessary implication vests him with the legal title.⁴⁵ The executor takes the title or right of possession where the realty is expressly devised to him for the purpose of being sold,⁴⁶ or in trust for other purposes,⁴⁷ or where such title is otherwise given to him by the will, either expressly or by necessary implication.⁴⁸

c. Statutory Modifications of Rule

In some jurisdictions statutes give to the executor or administrator a certain control over the realty of decedent.

In some jurisdictions the statutes give to the executor or administrator a certain control over the land of decedent,⁵⁵ usually either for the purpose of preserving it from waste during the course of administration,⁵⁶ effecting a division and distribution among those entitled,⁵⁷ or subjecting it to the payment of the decedent's debts in case the personal assets prove insufficient for this purpose.⁵⁸ However, such grants, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed and the rights of the representative confined to those which are clearly given to him.⁵⁹

Power connected with a trust

Where a power is given to an executor to sell land, when in his opinion the sale can be made to good advantage, the proceeds to be distributed to children as they come of age, it is a power connected with a trust, and the executor is entitled to possession of the land, as against the heir on whom the title descended, subject to be divested by the execution of the power.—Dabney v. Manning, 3 Ohio 321, 17 Am.D. 597.

Letters issued prior to effective date of statute

Where letters of administration were issued to administrator prior to the effective date of statute giving administrator certain control over and right to deal with real estate of an intestate, the rights of administrator were controlled by the law as it existed prior to the enactment of such statute.—In re Carasone, 10 N.Y.S.2d 5, 244 App.Div. 310.

§ 253. Actions Relating to Realty

An executor or administrator ordinarily may not bring an action relating to the realty of the decedent.

From the general rule that an executor or administrator has no title to, interest in, or control over decedent's realty, see supra § 252 a, it follows that he is not ordinarily entitled to bring any action relating thereto.⁶⁰ By statute or otherwise, however, an executor or administrator sometimes is authorized to bring such actions.⁶¹

§ 254. — For Trespass and Waste

Actions for trespass to realty and waste accruing after the death of his decedent are maintainable by an executor or administrator where he is given the right of possession; but where he has no right of possession he cannot maintain such an action.

Actions for trespass to realty and waste accruing after the death of his decedent are maintainable by an executor or administrator, where he is given the right of possession by the provisions of the will or by statute,⁶² but, in the absence of any testamentary or statutory provision giving him such a right of possession, the general rule that the representative has no concern with the realty, see supra § 252 a, precludes the maintenance by him of such an action.⁶³

§ 255. — To Quiet Title

An executor or administrator may bring an action to quiet title to the decedent's realty when he is expressly authorized to do so by statute or when by statute or by the terms of the will he is given the right to possession of, or control over, the property.

Under the general rule that an executor or administrator has no title to, or control over, the realty of his decedent, see supra § 252 a, he ordinarily may not bring an action to quiet, or remove a cloud from, the title to decedent's real estate,⁶⁴ at least before he obtains a license to sell,⁶⁵ and this rule has been applied to realty situated outside the state.⁶⁶ However, an executor or administrator may bring such an action when he is expressly authorized to do so by statute, or when by statute or by the terms of the will he is given the right to possession of, or control over, the realty of decedent.⁶⁷

Expiration of court order

Where probate court's original order authorizing executor to take charge of decedent's real estate pursuant to statute had expired, when second appointment of an administrator pending the contest of decedent's will was made, such administrator acquired no power over decedent's realty under the original order authorizing executor to take charge of same.—*State ex rel. Recovery for damages to realty ordered sold

(1) Where an order has issued out of probate court directing an executor to sell lands to pay debts, see infra §§ 538-542, he may sue to recover damages for the wrongful destruction of the market value of such premises, where it appears that rights of a creditor will be prejudiced thereby.—*Clark v. § 256. — For Injuries during Decedent's Lifetime

The executor or administrator is the proper party to sue for damages for an injury to decedent's realty which occurred during his lifetime.

The executor or administrator is, it has been held, the proper party to maintain an action for damages for an injury to decedent's realty which occurred during his lifetime.⁶⁹ However, it has been asserted that at common law a cause of action for trespass to realty does not survive the death of the owner, see Abatement and Revival § 132, and that in the absence of statute the executor or administrator may not sue at law for damages occasioned by the

§ 257. Possession and Use

- a. In general
- b. Nature of right of possession

a. In General

An executor or administrator may, when authorized by statute or by the terms of the will, take possession of and use lands which belonged to, and were left by, the decedent.

Under statute, in a number of jurisdictions, the personal representative has the right or duty under certain circumstances, such as the insufficiency of the personalty to meet the debts of the estate, or even generally, to take possession of the realty either for the purpose of sale or in order to apply as assets the proceeds realized from its use during the period of administration;⁷¹ also an executor is en-

Where estate had not been distributed, the executrix had the lawful right to bring action to quiet title.—Rehart v. Klossner, Cal.App., 119 P.2d 145.

Existence of heirs as necessary

Statute authorizing an administrator to bring suit to quiet title for the benefit of heirs, whether known or unknown, gives no authority to an administrator to bring suit to quiet title to property of a decedent where there are no heirs.—Pelton v. Shook, 226 P. 142, 75 Colo. 283.

Effect on rights of heirs

(1) "By our statute, the administrator is clothed with a right to the possession of the realty for the purposes of administration, and that right, when asserted by him, dominates and intercepts the descent of lands to the heir."—Ex parte Stephens, 170 So. 771, 772, 233 Ala. 167.

(2) "If a recognized or statutory necessity exists, the personal representative may intercept the possession of the heir or devisee to the real estate, for the purpose of a due administration of the estate and payment of debts."—Powell v. Labry, 97 So. 707, 709, 210 Ala. 248.

titled to possession of the real estate when the testator has by his will directed or permitted the executor to take possession thereof for any purpose.⁷² At common law, and in the absence of the circumstances, if any, contemplated by such statutory or testamentary provisions, the personal representative is not entitled to the possession and use of the real estate of his decedent.⁷³

A representative who is authorized by will to sell is entitled to the control and possession of the title deeds if this is necessary to a proper discharge of his duties,⁷⁴ although a mere power of sale does not, of itself, give any right of possession or use of the property until the sale.⁷⁵ It has been considered that where the executor is also devisee of land of which he is in possession, he must be regarded as holding the land in the capacity of executor until the debts of the decedent are paid.⁷⁶

An order of court is necessary, under some statutes, to authorize the executor or administrator to take possession or control of realty,⁷⁷ and such order must be based on the actual existence of the necessity for the representative's taking possession,⁷⁸ and on notice to the heirs or devisees.⁷⁹ The correctness of the ruling of the court permitting the representative to take possession may be challenged by a devisee.⁸⁰ Such an order has been held not a prerequisite to a suit by a personal representative against an heir for the possession of land but, when obtained, is prima facie evidence of the necessity to sell on the ground stated in the application therefor, when service of notice of the application was by publication, and such an order is conclusive evidence when the heir was given personal notice.⁸¹

To what lands statutes are applicable. Statutes giving the right of possession of lands to the executor or administrator refer only to such lands as are described therein.⁸² Thus it has been held that such a statute refers only to such lands as belonged to and were left by decedent,⁸³ and not to lands bid in by the administrator or executor at a sale under execution or mortgage foreclosure, as to which he has the same right of possession as to personality,⁸⁴ and such a statute does not apply to lands situated in another state.⁸⁵

The right of the representative to possess and control realty is temporary and limited to the purposes of administration, ceasing when the estate is settled; and it is subject to control by the court for administration purposes.

Only in a proper case is a personal representative under a duty to exercise his right of possession of the realty,⁸⁶ as where it is necessary to do so because the personalty is insufficient to meet the debts and claims;⁸⁷ and it is only to the extent that the right is actually exercised that the common-law rights of the statutory distributees in the realty are disturbed or impaired.⁸⁸ In many respects, the possessory right of the personal representative is for and on behalf of the heirs, and in harmony with their claims.⁸⁹ Until it is exercised, it does not constitute an intervening estate in possession as against the heir,⁹⁰ and it ceases when the debts are paid and the estate settled,⁹¹ being temporary and limited to the purposes of administration.⁹² It includes the right to receive the rents,⁹³ and gives the representative a qualified interest in the land,⁹⁴ with all the rights and powers ordinarily incident to the right of possession.⁹⁵ The right is subject to the rights of the widow and family to dower and homestead;⁹⁶ and, as it is purely statutory, it may be taken away after the representative has entered into possession, as well as before.⁹⁷

The possession of the administrator is possession

by the court,⁹⁸ and is subject to the control of the court for administration purposes.⁹⁹

Relation back of possession. It has been held that when an administrator takes possession of his decedent's real estate such possession relates back to the time of decedent's death.¹

§ 258. — Actions to Recover or Protect Possession

By virtue of statute or testamentary direction, a personal representative may be entitled to prosecute or defend actions for recovering possession of decedent's land.

By virtue of the directions of a will, or under statute, an executor or administrator may be temporarily entitled or required to prosecute or defend actions for recovering possession of decedent's land, as a sort of trustee or representative of the heirs or devisees and of the general interests of the estate;² but, where no interest in the realty of his decedent is thus vested in him, he has no such authority.³ As a general rule, the burden is on the personal representative to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, his right to recover,⁴ but it has been held that where such representative seeks possession within the period for presenting claims against the estate, the burden of proof as to the necessity of subjecting the lands to administration is on him who takes the position that the representative is acting hastily.⁵ As against one not an heir, an administrator may maintain an action for the recovery of land belonging to the estate of the deceased, without showing a necessity to administer the land for the purpose of paying debts.⁶ An administrator in possession of decedent's realty may invoke the aid of equity to protect his possession against a fraudulent claim thereto by another.⁷

Ejectment or writ of entry. An executor or administrator entitled to temporary possession of his decedent's realty for the purpose of settling the estate may prosecute or defend an action of ejectment or a writ of entry,⁸ but where he is not thus entitled to possession, or where the title vests directly in the heirs or devisees, with at most a power of sale in the representative, he has no such authority,⁹ and, as an administrator in such case is not the proper party to prosecute an action of ejectment, he cannot maintain an appeal in such an action originally instituted by decedent.¹⁰

Forcible entry and detainer. An executor or administrator is entitled to maintain an action of forcible entry and detainer where he is entitled to possession of the land,¹¹ or where decedent had a mere chattel interest therein,¹² but not otherwise.¹³

Pleading, evidence, and trial. General rules governing pleadings,¹⁴ the weight and sufficiency of evidence,¹⁵ and the conduct of trials¹⁶ have been applied in actions by representatives to recover or protect possession of realty.

Although a will imposed a duty on the executors to collect rents and pay them to the widow of the testator, the children of the testator could, with the consent of the widow, be allowed to occupy portions, which would belong to them after the death of the widow, without paying rent, since such a course is the equivalent of payment of the rent by the children to the executors, and by the executors to the widow, and by the widow back to the children.—In re Murphy's Estate, 228 N.W. 658, 209 Iowa 679.

der of court be obtained authorizing the representative to rent or use the land and apply the rents and profits to the purposes of the administration.¹⁹ Compliance must be had with such statutes,²⁰ and they should be construed liberally to give effect to the intent with which they were enacted.²¹

At common law, and in the absence of the circumstances or contingencies contemplated by such testamentary or statutory provisions, the personal representative has no authority or duty to collect rents and profits accruing after the death of his decedent, the right thereto being in the heir or devisee of the realty.²² A mere naked or contingent power to sell does not give the representative a right to the rents and profits, but in such case the heirs or devisees may enter upon the estate and receive all rents and profits until such power is appropriately exercised.²³

The consent of heirs or devisees may warrant the collection of rents of real estate by the executor,²⁴ and the receipt of rents and profits of real estate with such consent gives the representative a lawful possession and a good title against all persons except the heirs.²⁵

It has been held that, where land is rented for a year and the lessor dies intestate within the year, the heirs have no title, merely as heirs, to the rent accruing for that year, but the rent is personality and the right to collect and distribute it is in the administrator.—Autrey v. Autrey, 20 S.E. 431, 94 Ga. 579, followed in Strickland v. Thornton, 58 S.E. 540, 2 Ga.App. 377—24 C.J. p 140 note 98.

Remedy of distress

The personal representative of a deceased landlord cannot enforce the remedy of distress for rent due at

do so where no such rightful control exists.²⁷

b. Disposition of Rents and Profits

Rents collected by the personal representative from realty belonging to the estate may be applied on obligations of the estate, or for other proper purposes connected with the administration.

Rents collected by the personal representative from realty belonging to the estate should be applied by him for proper purposes of the administration.²⁸ It is proper to apply rents on the obligations of the estate;²⁹ and a representative who has collected rents may be protected where, instead of paying them over to the heirs or other distributees, he has under prudent and reasonable circumstances applied them beneficially for the premises, as in keeping down mortgage interest and preventing foreclosure at a sacrifice,³⁰ for needful labor on the premises,³¹ or for keeping the buildings in proper repair.³² It has been held, however, that an administrator has no authority to apply rents collected to taxes and arrears of ground rent accruing subsequently to the death of decedent.³³ A court has refused to call a widow who was administratrix to account for rents and profits expended in the support of infant children of decedent;³⁴ and it has been held that under a statute giving executors and administrators possession and control of the real estate not specifically devised during the settlement of the estate, such possession and control were for the benefit of the persons entitled to the real estate, and that rents and profits not needed for the payment of debts went on distribution with the land as incident thereto, and did not go to the residuary legatees.³⁵

c. Liability of Representative

- (1) In general
- (2) In what capacity liable

(1) In General

A personal representative who takes over the possession, control, or use of his decedent's realty must account for the rents and profits which he received or should have received.

An executor or administrator who takes over the possession, control, or use of the real property of his decedent must account for the rents and profits which he received or should have received,³⁶ although it seems that where he acts diligently and landlord's death or accruing thereafter.—Staton v. Guillebeaux, 116 S.E. 443, 123 S.C. 363, 31 A.L.R. 1.

Rents collected from devised land

Although ordinarily rents collected by executor from devised realty go to devisee, order may authorize application of such rents to repairs, taxes, insurance, and mortgage indebtedness on tract from which rents were derived, if such application will not injure devisee's interest.—Commercial Nat. Bank of Charlotte v. Misenheimer, 191 S.E. 14, 211 N.C. 519, 110 A.L.R. 1310.

Executor's failure to take security for payment of rents for property owned by deceased's estate rendered him liable for uncollected and unsecured rents.—Parrish v. Johnson, Tex. Civ.App., 88 S.W.2d 1066, error refused.

Realty obtained by foreclosure

While administratrix was retaining realty which was deemed personalty because acquired by foreclosure of mortgage, constituting a salvage operation, her obligations in respect of its care and conservation continued as before, and she would be accountable for any net revenue derived from its use, just as if it were the original mortgage.—In re Vallonis' Estate, 26 N.Y.S.2d 540, 176 Misc. 110.

Time for charging representative

A personal representative should not be charged by a devisee with rent collected from realty specifically devised, under a bona fide and reasonable belief of its necessity for the payment of debts, until after the period for presentation of claims against an estate has expired.—Powehl v. Labry, 97 So. 707, 210 Ala. 248.

honestly with regard to realty in his possession and control he is liable only for such rents and profits as he may have received.³⁷ Thus a representative who occupies such property for his own purposes,³⁸ or who negligently fails to rent it,³⁹ is liable for the value of the rents and profits which should have been received by the estate; but where he has occupied realty merely for the purpose of preserving or protecting it,⁴⁰ or in order to benefit the estate in some other manner,⁴¹ without any profit to himself, he is not liable for the rental value of such occupation. Where it is necessary to sell lands for payment of debts, and the representative fails to take proper steps to that end within a reasonable time, he may be held liable for rent.⁴² An executor or administrator is not responsible for rents for a time when the real estate was not in his possession or control, unless he has been guilty of some laches or lack of good faith which has resulted in a loss to those entitled to the rents.⁴³

Deduction for outlays. Rents or profits to be accounted for by the representative are net, and subject to suitable deductions for his outlays, expenses, and services,⁴⁴ although not necessarily for improvements, or for any outlays or expenses inconsistent with an honest and prudent management of the property.⁴⁵

Interest on the value of the rents may sometimes be charged against the representative.⁴⁶

A statute providing a mode for determining the amount due for the use or income of real estate, when the occupation is such as to create a liability therefor, and the disposition of such amount, does not make an executor or administrator liable for the use and occupation of real estate for which he would not otherwise be liable in some form.⁴⁷

(2) In What Capacity Liable

A personal representative lawfully in possession or control of realty is accountable in his representative capacity for rents and profits received; but where his possession or control was without authority, he is held to account therefor only in his individual capacity.

Whether the representative's liability to account for rents and profits is in his representative or his individual capacity depends on the facts of the par-

Pro rata share in upkeep of homestead was properly charged to an executor who administered it as part of the estate of the testator, where such upkeep enabled him to collect the rents of the homestead for his individual benefit.—Reeves v. Reeves, 128 So. 330, 157 Miss. 448.

Life estate charged with expenses

An executor who has permitted land, a life estate in which is charged by the will with the payment of expenses of administration, to pass into the possession of the devisee for life, and suffered him to enjoy the rents and profits thereof for more than twenty years, is justly chargeable with rents and profits to the amount of administration expenses.—Tilton v. Tilton, 41 N.H. 479.

Circumstances relieving executor of charge

(1) Executor was held not chargeable for rents and profits of land for two years after testator's death under will showing intention to give unmarried daughters free use of farm for two years.—Weade v. Weade, 150 S.E. 238, 153 Va. 540.

(2) Where testator at his death owned a house and lot occupied by the executor, whose wife was a residuary legatee, and it was agreed that she should have the house and lot in payment of her legacy, and a deed thereto was executed and delivered to her, and the executor with his family continued to occupy the house, and there was nothing to show that it was not advantageous to the estate to settle the claim of the wife by conveying the property, the executor was held not chargeable with the rental value of the property after the execution and delivery of the deed.—In re Lane, 65 A. 102, 79 Vt. 323.

Executor as heir or devisee

ticular case.⁴⁸ The general rule is that, where the representative is lawfully in possession or control under testamentary or statutory authority, he accounts in his representative capacity for the rents and profits received as assets for the payment of debts or distribution, as the case may be,⁴⁹ although negligence in the management of the property may subject him to personal liability,⁵⁰ while if he has taken possession or control without authority he is not in his representative capacity chargeable with, or liable to account for, the rents and profits or proceeds received,⁵¹ but is held to account therefor in his individual capacity on the theory that they have been received by him as agent or implied trustee for those entitled to the realty.⁵² It is usually considered that, where the representative has received rents and accounted therefor or paid them out in discharge of the debts of his decedent, he is precluded from alleging that they belong to the heir and that he received them without authority, and those entitled to the rents may charge him therewith in his representative capacity as for assets rightfully received;⁵³ while, if he received them without authority, he is also chargeable in his individual capacity for what he has paid out,⁵⁴ the one entitled to the rents has the right to elect in which capacity he shall be charged, and he cannot defeat a recovery against him in his representative capacity on the ground that he is personally liable.⁵⁵

§ 260. Repairs and Improvements

The personal representative may, under testamentary or statutory provisions, have a duty to preserve the realty of the estate, and to keep all structures thereon in proper repair.

Although there is authority that the personal representative has no duty to repair buildings located upon realty belonging to the estate,⁵⁶ he may have a duty, under provisions of the will⁵⁷ or of statute,⁵⁸ to preserve such realty and to keep all structures thereon in proper repair.

§ 261. Mortgaged and Encumbered Property

An executor or administrator has no better title to mortgaged property than his decedent had during his lifetime as respects his right to subject it to claims of creditors.

An executor or administrator has no better title to mortgaged property than his decedent had during his lifetime as respects his right to subject such property to the claims of creditors,⁵⁹ although under statutes in some jurisdictions an administrator's consent to a mortgagee's entry on mortgaged property and to assignment of rents is binding on the heirs and next of kin.⁶⁰

§ 262. — Purchase of Encumbrance by Representative

A representative may not purchase a mortgage on land of the estate, but the mere fact that he takes a transfer to himself has been held not to render the transaction void.

The representative cannot buy for his own benefit a mortgage on the land of the estate;⁶¹ but if he has advanced his own funds to prevent the property from being sacrificed and benefited the estate thereby, the mere fact that he took a transfer of the debt to himself does not render the transaction void,⁶² or preclude his being credited with the amount advanced.⁶³

§ 263. — Discharge of Encumbrance

- a. In general
- b. In interest of heir or devisee
- c. Testamentary directions

a. In General

A representative may discharge an encumbrance on realty of the estate where it is needed for the payment of debts and such realty is worth more than the amount of the encumbrance.

While some cases applying strictly the rule that the representative is not concerned with the realty, as shown supra § 252, deny that he is under any duty or has any right to apply the assets to removing encumbrances from land⁶⁴ which is not needed for the payment of debts or for the purposes of administration,⁶⁵ in other cases it has been considered proper for the personal representative to protect mortgaged or encumbered real estate by paying interest, or even the principal of the debt,⁶⁶ at least when the real estate is needed for the payment of debts and the particular property is worth more than the amount required to relieve it from the encumbrance thereon,⁶⁷ or, as it has been expressed, when the discharge of the encumbrance is beneficial to the estate.⁶⁸

In some cases it has been held that the representative can maintain an action to cancel a mortgage purporting to be executed by his decedent, as fraudulent and void,⁶⁹ or as having been paid,⁷⁰ or to compel an assignment of a mortgage on the realty to prevent foreclosure and thus to save the estate from loss;⁷¹ but the existence of such powers has also been denied.⁷² A representative who goes beyond his duty in such matters must bear all losses resulting to the estate,⁷³ but in the absence of proof that the condition of the estate did not warrant the redemption of encumbered property it will be presumed that the representative acted properly in redeeming.⁷⁴

to his widow without any valuable consideration, the land covered by the mortgage was the primary fund out of which it should be paid, and the widow, as executrix, could not in the first instance pay it off from the general property of the estate.⁷⁵

Mortgage executed by representative. Assets of the estate may properly be applied in payment of a real estate mortgage legally executed by an executor or administrator for the purpose of raising funds.⁷⁶

Taxes and insurance. The personal representative should not as a general rule pay taxes assessed on real estate after decedent's death, or insurance on buildings, although under particular wills or by virtue of local legislation it may become his duty to do so as shown supra §§ 235, 238.

b. In Interest of Heir or Devisee

An heir or devisee may require the personal representative to exonerate realty from a debt constituting a lien thereon, unless the testator has expressed a contrary intention or there is a statutory provision changing the rule.

The common-law rule that the personalty is the primary fund for payment of decedent's personal debts, to the exoneration of the realty, discussed infra § 479, has been extended so far as to allow the heir or devisee to require the executor or administrator to exonerate the realty from a debt constituting a lien thereon, unless the testator has expressed his intention to the contrary in plain and unequivocal terms.⁷⁷ The rule relates, however, only to personal debts of decedent; and if he acquired land already subject to a mortgage his representative cannot be required to discharge it⁷⁸ unless decedent made the debt his own,⁷⁹ a result which is not effected by a mere assumption of the encumbrance by decedent, by means of a covenant in the conveyance to him or some other agreement with the grantor.⁸⁰ It is also considered that the rule applies only in favor of the heirs or devisees, and that an alienee of the heir or devisee is not entitled to require the representative to discharge the mortgage.⁸¹

The common-law rule has been changed by statute in a few jurisdictions so that the person who takes land by descent or devise must satisfy a lien thereon out of his own property without resorting to the representative unless the testator expressly directs that the lien be otherwise paid.⁸² The common-law rule should not be applied as between heirs or devisees and creditors, to the prejudice of the latter,⁸³ nor were the statutes changing the common-law rule meant to affect the rights of creditors,⁸⁴ but only to govern the rule of marshaling between the representative and the heirs or devisees.⁸⁵

c. Testamentary Directions

Specific directions in the will must govern the action of the representative with respect to payment of encumbrances on realty.

Where a testator has by his will given specific directions in respect of the course to be pursued with reference to encumbrances upon land, such directions must govern the action of the representative.⁸⁶

§ 264. — Mortgagee as Administrator

There is authority in favor of and authority against the right of a mortgagee-administrator to exercise a power of sale in the mortgage.

Payment in advance of due dates

Payment by executors of certain sums on account of amortization of mortgages upon property constituting an asset of decedent's estate, in advance of due dates required by terms of the mortgages, was not improvident and negligent, where estate at time of the payment was in ample funds and it appeared to the fiduciaries that vigilance and prudence required the payment to be made, and hence executors and trustees could not be surcharged for the payment.—In re Wechsler's Estate, 13 N.Y.S.2d 940, 171 Misc. 738.

his mortgage in any manner he may deem best, and if he sells the property and gives a general warranty he does not thereby prejudice any right of the heirs to redeem, and he is not chargeable as administrator with the proceeds of the sale,⁸⁷ but it has also been held that such a mortgagee cannot exercise a power of sale in the mortgage but must pay the mortgage debt out of the personality.⁸⁸

The performance and protection of the rights and duties with respect to realty held by the estate under a lease devolve upon the personal representative.

Since a lease of lands is a chattel interest going to the representative as assets, discussed supra § 108, it devolves upon the representative to perform the contract and he is liable for a breach of it,⁸⁹ while, on the other hand, he may maintain an action on a lease implied in law.⁹⁰ He may maintain ejectment with relation to the leased lands,⁹¹ sue for a trespass when he is in possession,⁹² or sue the landlord for forcible entry and taking possession on the death of the lessee.⁹³

Although the right to renewal of a lease has been held to pass to the administrator of a deceased lessee as shown supra § 108, such right or power cannot be delegated,⁹⁴ but it may be waived by him.⁹⁵

Cropping lease. Where a lease provided that the lessor should furnish seed and implements, and the lessee labor, and the crop to be divided in certain proportions, and the lessee died after the crop was grown, but before it was gathered, the representatives of the lessee were entitled to recover on a quantum meruit the amount of the lessee's interest in the crop, less the loss or damage caused by his death.⁹⁶

Sale or surrender of lease. A sale of a lease or the unexpired term as a chattel interest in the representative's hands may be valid, although made without a license from the court,⁹⁷ but the representative cannot lawfully surrender the lease and take another lease in his own name.⁹⁸ Where the representative sells the unexpired term of the lease, he must account only for the excess beyond the sum required to pay the rents reserved in the original lease.⁹⁹

§ 266. — Liability for Rent

Where an executor or representative takes possession under a lease to his decedent, he is personally liable for rent, and the lessor has an election to look to the estate alone or to hold the representative personally liable.

After the death of a tenant his estate remains liable for the payment of rent for the remainder of the term of the lease as shown in the C.J.S. title Landlord and Tenant § 523, also 36 C.J. p 370 note 38, and a restriction requiring use solely by lessee was held not to relieve the administrator from paying rent accruing after the tenant's death.¹ Where the representative has not entered or held possession after the death of the lessee, he is liable for rent only in his representative capacity and not personally,² and is entitled to credit in his accounts for the rent paid.³ However, it has been laid down as

Election of representative

When the lessee of realty under an unexpired lease dies, the leased property comes into the possession of the personal representative, who may keep the property and charge the estate with the performance of the lease, sublet, if permitted by contract or statute, or he may surrender the premises and cancel the lease, subject to damages for breach of contract.—Brown's Ex'r v. U. S. Trust Co., 215 S.W. 815, 185 Ky. 747, 8 A.L.R. 1142.

Credit on rent due

Administratrix of lessee was not entitled to credit on rent due for period of occupancy of premises in amount paid in advance by lessee to be applied on last month's rent in event of full performance of covenants, where administratrix gave notice of termination of tenancy and abandoned premises prior to expiration of term.—James v. Corvin, 51 P.2d 689, 184 Wash. 356.

Right of occupancy

Where lessors availed themselves of acceleration clause of lease and obtained judgment for full amount of unexpired part of lease, such action gave them status of judgment creditors and conferred on succession of lessee right of occupancy of leased premises.—Succession of Israel, La.App., 154 So. 487.

the rule that the representative who takes possession under a lease to his decedent is also personally liable⁴ at least to the extent of the profits of the land,⁵ or the reasonable worth of the use of the premises,⁶ and in such case the lessor has an election either to look to the estate alone or to hold the representative personally liable.⁷ The representative is not relieved from liability for rent by obtaining a purchaser ready to accept an assignment of the lease, but who afterward withdrew because the lessor refused to recognize him as a tenant.⁸ Where the term of a lease was unexpired when the lessee died, and his widow as administratrix made all reasonable and proper efforts to sublet the premises, occupying them in the meantime, she was not chargeable in her account with rent during the time of her occupancy.⁹

New lease or renewal. It has been held that an executor cannot bind the estate by acceptance of a lease for a term of years beginning after the death of decedent,¹⁰ and an administrator of a lessee in a lease which provides for renewal only at the option of the lessee, on a valuation of the land only, the improvements belonging to the lessee, and making no provision for compensation therefor if there was no renewal, cannot bind the estate by a renewal, so that he is properly sued personally for the rent on a lease made to him as administrator.¹¹

In the absence of statutory authority or an order of court, the representative of a decedent cannot as a general rule maintain an action on or perform a contract relating to real property.

While the representative cannot as a general rule maintain an action on or perform a contract or covenant relating to real property of his decedent, since this devolves rather upon heirs or devisees,¹² he may be given ample authority by statute or the express provisions of the will under which he acts to do so,¹³ and heirs or devisees may also confer

Promise to pay; reasonable value

A promise of an executrix to pay the rent of premises leased by her testator, pursuant to which she thereafter remained in possession, created relation of landlord and tenant, which continued during possession of executrix; and she is liable for the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the premises, notwithstanding lease did not terminate on death of testator.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Swanson, 238 P. 736, 73 Cal. App. 229.

Rent reserved prima facie evidence

The representative is liable only for the real worth of the premises, and while the rent reserved by the lease is prima facie evidence of the value of the premises and the extent of the representative's liability, it is open to him to show that the premises, during the time for which he is liable, was of less value.—Fessenden v. Estate as grantee in deed

Vendor's tender to administrator of deceased purchaser's estate of deed executed to estate of decedent was held insufficient as tender, since estate of decedent was not a person who could be a grantee under law of Florida, where the realty was located, or under the law of Michigan.—In re Reason's Estate, 267 N.W. 863, 276 Mich. 376.

Right to assign

The representative has no right to assign the contract of decedent for purchase of land without consent of heirs.—Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 398, 10 Am.D. 343.

Setting contract aside

The representative is not a proper party to set aside a land contract of deceased.—Van Horn v. Herndon, 235 N.W. 201, 253 Mich. 408.

Covenants in warranty deed

Where original vendor of realty under contract of sale subsequently conveyed property to another by warranty deed, subject to rights of original purchaser, covenants in warranty deed would run with land and accrue to benefit of executors of purchaser on payment of note for purchase price and deed by subsequent grantee.—Coral Gables v. Jones, 187 A. 434, 323 Pa. 425.

Statute permissive

Under statute providing that executors of persons who have made sale of realty may convey, purchaser could not obtain conveyance power on him in such matters at least so as to conclude their own rights.¹⁴ The intervention of the probate court is also frequently provided for in such matters; or equity will intervene to carry into practical effect a realty transaction beneficial to the estate.¹⁵ It has been stated that the representatives of a deceased vendee under a land contract become the vendee's assignees by operation of law,¹⁶ and that the representatives may¹⁷ or ought to¹⁸ complete a contract made by decedent. However, even though it is made the duty of executors and administrators to perform valid and uncompleted contracts entered into by testator, they may not expend the estate's funds to do new work which testator was not bound to do.¹⁹ If the executor or administrator carries out decedent's contract he is bound to account for what he received thereunder,²⁰ while if in completing such contract he takes the title to property he holds such property in trust for the heirs.²¹

b. Actions

- (1) In general
- (2) Specific performance

(1) In General

The personal representative may sometimes sue to recover purchase money unpaid at death of his deceased vendor or to recover damages for a breach of contract.

The personal representative of the vendor is generally the proper party to enforce a contract or recover purchase money which is unpaid at the death of the vendor,²² and he may sometimes bring an action to recover the purchase money paid by decedent²³ or damages for the breach of contract.²⁴ Conversely, he may be sued for the balance due on decedent's contract to purchase realty.²⁵

(2) Specific Performance

By virtue of statutory provisions in some jurisdictions, a special proceeding may be instituted in the probate court for specific performance of contracts of a decedent relative to real estate.

In some states the probate court has been given jurisdiction over the specific enforcement of contracts of a decedent relative to real estate,²⁶ and authorized to empower the personal representative to fulfill a contract to convey real estate made by his decedent in his lifetime.²⁷ By virtue of these statutes, the representative may petition for specific performance of decedent's contracts²⁸ and a person to whom a decedent had contracted to convey land may proceed against the personal representative for specific performance.²⁹ Such statutory proceeding is summary³⁰ and, while it is incidental to administration,³¹ the court can, in an independent proceeding not connected with some other proceeding in the estate, determine the right to specific performance of the contract.³² Although it has been held similar to, and in practical effect is, an action for specific performance,³³ it is not the ordinary action for specific performance,³⁴ and the authority of the court is to be exercised in a special manner and not according to the course of the common law.³⁵ A petition must be filed,³⁶ and notice must be served³⁷ on necessary parties,³⁸ and the burden

General principles applied

If the approval of the probate court is sought for permission to make a deed where an oral contract is involved, the court must apply the principles applicable to the performance of such contracts as they are applied in courts having jurisdiction to enforce specific performance.—Arkansas Valley Trust Co. v. Young, 195 S.W. 36, 128 Ark. 42.

of court.⁴⁹ A deed of an executor or administrator, when the necessary authority to execute the same exists, is admissible in evidence without further proof⁵⁰ and has been held to be prima facie evidence of title in the grantee,⁵¹ and relates back to the time of decedent's death as far as regards the capacity of the heirs to take.⁵²

Delivery of decedent's deed. It has been held that the representative may deliver a deed executed by decedent in his lifetime on the purchaser's compliance with his part of the contract of sale at the time stipulated,⁵³ although there is also authority for the contrary view.⁵⁴

d. Rescission, Revival, or Modification

An executor or administrator ordinarily has no authority as such to cancel, waive, rescind, or modify a contract for the sale or purchase of land made by his decedent.

An executor or administrator has ordinarily no authority as such to cancel, waive, rescind, or modify a contract or covenant for the sale or purchase of land made by his decedent,⁵⁵ although such a power may be conferred by statute⁵⁶ or exercised pursuant to an order of the probate court where the personal property is insufficient to pay the debts;⁵⁷ and in some jurisdictions the probate court has, under statute, power to order the rescission of such a contract under other circumstances.⁵⁸ Where a purchaser has rightfully abandoned a contract for the conveyance of land, having the right to rescind, such contract is at an end, and cannot be revived by the action of his administrator in treating it as still in force;⁵⁹ and where the administratrix of the vendor of a contract for the sale of land elects, on default of the purchaser, to declare the contract forfeited, and the purchaser acquiesces in her election, her act is binding on the estate, and a subsequent administrator cannot revoke it, except for fraud.⁶⁰ It has also been held that if decedent had the right under the contract to have the purchase money refunded because he was dissatisfied with the property, such right may be enforced by his personal representative,⁶¹ and that a court of equity will not,

Collateral attack

Where an administrator's deed was executed under order of court, in fulfillment of decedent's bond for title, a subsequent objection, in trespass to try title, that the deed was invalid for failure to conform to the description of the land contained in the bond, was a collateral attack on the judgment, and unsustainable.—Dutton v. Wright, 85 S.W. 1025, 38 Tex.Civ.App. 372.

Community property

Where the representatives executed a deed as such representatives of community property of decedent and wife, reciting a decree of the probate court empowering such representatives to make title to the grantee according to a contract of deceased, and the receipt by them of the agreed consideration, it was held that, although the decree was void so that the deed was not binding on decedent's heirs, the grantee had the superior title, if decedent had contracted to convey the land to him, and he had paid the purchase money to decedent's legal representatives, of which facts the recitals in the deed as well as the fact that for sixty years thereafter no one claiming under decedent asserted claim to the land, but the grantee continuously asserted claim thereto and paid taxes thereon, were evidence.—Cope v. Blunt, 91 S.W. 615, 38 Tex.Civ.App. 516.

§ 268. Acquisition of Property by Representative

- a. In his individual capacity
- b. In his representative capacity

a. In His Individual Capacity

- (1) In general
- (2) Purchase from widow, heir, or devisee
- (3) At judicial or execution sale

(1) In General

A representative of a decedent may purchase property to which the estate has no right, but ordinarily he may not purchase property in which the estate is interested.

The office of an executor or administrator does not per se disable him as an individual from buying bona fide with his own money property to which the estate has no right,⁶³ and the heirs or devisees cannot compel him to give them the benefit of such a purchase, even though decedent in his lifetime had been in negotiation for the purchase of the same property.⁶⁴ However, his duty does preclude him from purchasing an outstanding adverse title to land of which his decedent died seized and claiming title to such land for his own benefit,⁶⁵ and any title so acquired by him will inure to the benefit of the estate;⁶⁶ and generally speaking, where he buys or redeems land with funds of the estate, or procures judgment satisfied from land in right of the estate, or in dereliction of duty abuses the confidence reposed in him by seeking an undue personal advantage in the acquisition of property from the exercise of his representative authority, he will be considered in equity, whatever may have been the formal expression of the conveyance or of notes given for the purchase money, as holding the property in his representative capacity or as a trustee of the estate and those in interest, and his acts will inure to the benefit of those interested therein, at the same time that his rights and title are effective as against others.⁶⁷ Also the representative cannot acquire title to any of the assets by adverse holding,⁶⁸ or by tax deed.⁶⁹

Where one named as executrix does not qualify or assume to act as such, she cannot be held as a trustee merely because she is made the grantee in a deed conveying land to which the testator held a bond for a deed, no part of the funds of the estate having been used in the purchase of such land.⁷⁰ Where a member of a firm owning realty dies, the administrator of the deceased partner may, in his private or individual capacity, purchase the land from the survivor,⁷¹ and it has been held that there is no reason why an administrator appointed in one state should not become the purchaser of land of his decedent situated in another state.⁷² Where a deed absolute in form, but intended as a mortgage, runs to the grantee individually, but is made in fact for the benefit of the estate of which she is administratrix, she must, on a bill to redeem, account for the rents and profits as administratrix.⁷³

Ratification or acquiescence. Ratification by heirs or other parties in interest, or long acquiescence with full knowledge of the facts, may estop them to object to the acquisition of property of the estate

(2) Purchase from Widow, Heir, or Devisee

A purchase of realty by an executor or administrator from a widow, heir, or devisee is valid where fairly made and with full disclosure on the part of the representative.

It is generally considered that an executor or administrator, acting fairly in the premises, may purchase from an heir or devisee, or from the widow of the decedent, his or her interest in the estate,⁷⁵ and although such a purchase is regarded with high disfavor,⁷⁶ and will be held invalid if the representative has taken any advantage of his position or been guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation,⁷⁷ the judicial disposition is usually to do no more than presume strongly against the validity of such a purchase and require the fiduciary to show affirmatively adequacy of consideration and the general fairness of the transaction,⁷⁸ and if the transaction is in good faith and without fraud it may be treated as a similar transaction between strangers would be.⁷⁹

(3) At Judicial or Execution Sale

Ordinarily an executor or administrator cannot purchase land of decedent for himself at a judicial or execution sale.

With reference to an executor or administrator purchasing land of decedent for himself at a judicial or execution sale, the rule is that he shall not be allowed to purchase property which he holds in trust, either directly or indirectly, or to antagonize the interests of the estate he represents by taking an adverse interest,⁸⁰ especially where the sale was made in consequence of his default in not paying the debt for which the property was sold, when he had sufficient funds in his hands for that purpose,⁸¹ or where he was guilty of fraud.⁸² However, in cases where the representative was not a trustee of the real estate at the time of the purchase, and the transaction was a fair one, and the sale was not due to any neglect or failure of duty on his part, a purchase by him has been allowed to stand,⁸³ and a purchase at a sale under an execution in his favor to save his own debt has been upheld.⁸⁴ Where the property is purchased at the sale by a third person, who makes the purchase in good faith, there is no reason why the administrator should not subsequently purchase the property from him.⁸⁵ Where certain land of a decedent was partitioned among his heirs by the probate court, that set apart to one of the heirs ceased to be the property of the estate, the administrator ceased to have any control thereover, and was not bound to pay the taxes thereon, or do anything to protect the rights of the heir, even though the administration had not been closed; and hence he could purchase the property at a tax sale thereof.⁸⁶

b. In His Representative Capacity

- (1) In general
- (2) At judicial or execution sale
- (3) Sale or mortgage of property acquired

(1) In General

Unless authorized by statute, or by the will, or by a court order, an executor or administrator may not purchase land with personality of the estate.

An executor or administrator has as a rule no power to buy land with personality of the estate, unless authorized to do so by the will or by statute or by an order of court;⁸⁷ but if he so purchases

the property purchased will be considered in equity as part of the estate and as impressed with the character of the purchase money, and an equitable lien of creditors of decedent is sometimes favorably regarded in such a connection.⁸⁸ Where executors have a discretion with regard to investment in real property, or where there is a necessity of receiving real estate in payment of a debt, the beneficiaries are bound to accept the property thus acquired.⁸⁹ The regularity of proceedings in the probate court under which an administrator was authorized to purchase land in controversy is not subject to collateral attack in an action of trespass to try title by such administrator.⁹⁰ Where title is taken in the name of coexecutors, they hold as joint tenants with the right of survivorship and not as tenants in common.⁹¹

Property taken in payment of debts. Where land is taken by the executor or administrator in payment of a debt due the estate, the land becomes assets in his hands and not property held in his individual right, and it should by way of substitution be subjected by him to the payment of debts and legacies, and to distribution, like personality.⁹²

The heirs cannot disaffirm the purchase of a debtor's realty if the representative acted prudently and for the good of the estate, especially if they delay unduly to proceed in the matter.⁹³

As guardian of minor

Administrator becoming guardian of minor heirs could not justify investment of corpus of estate in realty without court order, used by minors for home, on ground that investment was for minors' maintenance with approval of ordinary, and administrator was held liable to heirs, although acting in good faith with approval of ordinary and though heirs used realty as home.—Paulk v. Roberts, 155 S.E. 55, 42 Ga.App. 79.

Construction of will

Will providing for sale or purchase of property by executor only on assent of one of two named persons, or of a circuit court "judge" of named county in case of incapacity or refusal of either to act, contemplated assent of some circuit court judge rather than that of circuit court of such county, and any circuit court judge of such county could be appointed as a substitute, since substitute advisor was not personal, and appointment of one not a circuit court judge in absence of proof that all judges of such circuit court had refused to act was error.—Gathright's Trustee v. tor has been held justified in purchasing land at a judicial or execution sale.

The general rule is that when it is for the interest of the estate that he should do so, the executor or administrator is justified in purchasing land for the estate at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage belonging to the estate,⁹⁴ or an execution sale under a judgment in his favor on some debt due decedent.⁹⁵ In such a case the representative may take a deed in his own name and by a deed executed in his own name give a good title to others which the beneficiaries of the estate cannot dispute;⁹⁶ but the purchase is presumed to be intended for the benefit of the estate, and requires him to account and turn over the property or its proceeds to the parties who would have been entitled to the mortgage or judgment debt if paid, the premises in his hands taking that character accordingly; and, while he is chargeable with rents and profits later received or justly accruing, he should be reimbursed for his reasonable outlays and for such sum as he actually paid in the purchase.⁹⁷ Where an executor, in satisfaction of mortgage debts, accepted conveyances of the encumbered land and also foreclosed mortgages, and, on the sale, took deeds therefor to himself as executor, it was held that he must, as a condition precedent to his discharge and the liberation of his bondsmen, convey the premises to the legatees as tenants

in common.⁹⁸

(3) Sale or Mortgage of Property Acquired

The weight of authority supports the right of a representative to sell realty acquired by him in his representative capacity.

It has been asserted that a representative, unless, of course, he has a power of sale under the will, cannot sell, without an order of court, realty acquired by him in his representative capacity;⁹⁹ but the weight of authority is in support of the representative's power to sell such realty in his discretion without any order of court,¹ and a power to mortgage property so acquired has also been asserted.² Under such circumstances the purchaser is not required to see to the application of the purchase money;³ but the representative is chargeable therewith, and should appropriate it duly and account for it.⁴ A sale by an executor of such property may be set aside when tainted with fraud in which the purchaser participated.⁵

Exchange. Executors who hold realty by virtue of the foreclosure of a mortgage in favor of the estate are not entitled to exchange it for other realty, and, unless the persons entitled to share in that part of the estate consent to or ratify the trade, the executors are liable to account for the value of the realty conveyed to them.⁶

2. SALE IN GENERAL

§ 269. Power to Sell

In the absence of authority given by will or order of court, except to the extent that he is authorized to do so by statute, an executor or administrator has no power to sell the real estate of his decedent.

rule applies to the real estate of an alien decedent.⁸ Ordinarily he has no power to convey the real estate to an attorney in payment of attorney's fees, and an approval of such a conveyance by the probate court will not render it valid.⁹ Where the executors carry on the decedent's business without authority, their assignee for the benefit of creditors has no authority to sell decedent's real estate.¹⁰

An unauthorized sale or conveyance may be enjoined at the suit of heirs or devisees;¹¹ and a deed made by the representative without authority is void,¹² and his conveyance, in such a case, passes his individual interest only,¹³ except as it may operate to pass his own interest in the land as heir or devisee.¹⁴ An unauthorized sale cannot affect the rights of other heirs or devisees who seasonably undertake to assert such rights.¹⁵

Statutory authority; confirmation. Conclusiveness of order of confirmation; collateral attack

(1) Where the record on its face does not show that the order of confirmation is void, it is not subject to collateral attack.—Wood v. Roach, 14 P.2d 170, 125 Cal.App. 631.

(2) Although neither petition for confirmation nor order confirming sale of testator's realty stated statutory grounds, record did not show on face that order was void, and col-

an alleged sale which is void.²² The necessity for the sale may be alleged in the return, in the language of the statute,²³ but no allegation or finding of the statutory grounds for a sale is necessary to the jurisdiction of the court.²⁴ An amended return and petition for confirmation is not fatally defective because incorporating therein some of the necessary allegations by reference to the original return.²⁵ The question of the propriety of the sale is determined on the hearing of the return and application for confirmation,²⁶ and if the court's conclusions thereon are supported by the law and the evidence they will not be disturbed on appeal from the order of confirmation.²⁷ lateral attack was precluded.—Wood v. Roach, supra.

(3) Where record is silent respecting statutory grounds for sale of decedent's property, and superior court is exercising its general jurisdiction, nothing will be intended to be out of its jurisdiction except what expressly appears to be so.—Wood v. Roach, supra.

(4) In proceedings involving sales of decedents' property, where superior court acts under its general jurisdiction, existence of facts consistent with validity of judgment is presumed on collateral attack.—Wood v. Roach, supra.

(5) Irregularities in exercise of unquestionable jurisdiction will not invalidate probate sale or administrator's deed to extent of making them vulnerable to collateral attack.—Johnston v. Kitchin, 265 P. 941, 203 Cal. 766—Warden v. Bailey, 24 P.2d 192, 133 Cal.App. 383.

(7) Evidence that realty, purchased by husband with funds from spouses' joint bank account a few days before his death, probated as community property by surviving wife, and sold during course of probate for sum applied to satisfaction of husband's debts, was not actually sold in probate proceedings, but taken by purchaser in his own name without paying consideration and later reconveyed to wife, was properly excluded at hearing on petition for distribution of wife's estate.—In re Harris' Estate, 72 P.2d 873, 9 Cal.2d 649.

(8) Question whether property was free and clear of encumbrances could not be concluded by order confirming administrator's sale.—Baldwin v. Stewart, supra.

The state legislatures have from time to time also passed special or private acts authorizing or confirming in particular cases the sale of a decedent's real estate by his personal representative,²⁸ and such acts have been held constitutional,²⁹ although not in all instances.³⁰

§ 270. Contract of Sale

An unauthorized contract of sale entered into by the representative is not binding on the estate.

An unauthorized contract of sale entered into by the representative is not binding on, and cannot be enforced against, the estate,³¹ although the heirs are

(9) An attempt to have it declared that purchaser of land from decedent's estate held land in trust for creditors of purchaser's husband on ground that part of purchase price was paid by husband was not a "collateral attack" on probate order confirming sale.—Krauss v. Continuance of hearing

The refusal to grant request of new counsel for continuance of hearing on amended return of probate sale and petition for confirmation of sale was not abuse of discretion or denial of due process of law, where request was orally made in open court when cause was called, and superior court rules relating to applications for continuance were not complied with, and notice of change of counsel was not given or explained, and new counsel had general knowledge of matter, and many interested parties were in court and ready to proceed.—In re Dargie's

That counsel discussed proposed form of notice of probate sale in presence of trial judge was insufficient to show that the matter had been prejudged, so as to invalidate order confirming probate sale, where trial judge refused to express any opinion on form of notice to be used.—In re Dargie's Estate, supra.

named in the contract, but it is not signed by them.³² This rule applies to an option to purchase given by the representative,³³ to a contract to sell and give a conveyance on obtaining permission of the court,³⁴ or to a contract to obtain a conveyance, under an agreement to sell made by decedent, where the contract was not made on behalf, or with the knowledge, of the heirs.³⁵ However, such a contract of sale is not necessarily void, as it may bind the representative individually.³⁶ Where a contract for the sale of the land of a decedent is entered into by the widow and heirs, there is no such mutuality of obligation between the administrator and the purchaser as will entitle the administrator to enforce the contract.³⁷ An agreement to purchase and to pay a stated sum on receiving a copy of the court's order confirming the sale refers to an order authorizing the sale, as required by statute, where the purchaser is familiar with the court's practice.³⁸

§ 271. Status of Purchaser

A purchaser from an executor or administrator, under an authorized sale of property belonging to decedent, generally acquires a good title thereto; and, although the sale is void because made without proper authority, if the purchaser is put in possession by the representative he is not a trespasser.

An authorized sale by an executor or administrator vests a good title to the property in the purchaser,³⁹ in whom it remains so long as the deed is not set aside.⁴⁰ The purchaser takes title free from any right of possession in a tenant, under an unauthorized lease given by the administrator.⁴¹ The purchaser's title, however, may be subject to quarantine and dower rights;⁴² and, moreover, a purchaser acquires no title or equitable claim to property as to which the executor or administrator had no title to convey;⁴³ and where through a mutual mistake property not belonging to the estate is included in the sale the executor or administrator may be required to refund to the purchaser the amount received therefor;⁴⁴ but if the purchaser's injury, in this respect, arises from his own negligence, in seeking equity he must do equity by restoring the status quo as nearly as possible.⁴⁵ If the conveyance tendered is the only sort of deed the executor, under lawful authority, could execute, there is no infirmity of title to justify a rejection thereof, or to relieve the purchaser of his contract to purchase.⁴⁶ Where the land is conveyed by the administrator in compliance with an option to purchase given by the decedent, and those claiming the proceeds as real estate and those claiming them as personal property both affirm the sale and ask their respective shares of the purchase money, the grantee has a perfect title as against the claim of either.⁴⁷ A purchaser under a contract fraudulent in law on the part of the administrator can take no advantage thereunder as against a creditor injured thereby,⁴⁸ nor, where the purchaser has had possession of the premises, is he entitled to interest on a certificate of purchase under a prior sheriff's sale, it being presumed that the amount of the interest is offset by the possession.⁴⁹

A purchaser from an executor or administrator is put on notice that he is dealing with a person in a representative capacity and is bound to know the extent of his authority;⁵⁰ but, although the sale is void because made without proper authority, yet the purchaser who goes into possession by consent of the administrator is not a trespasser, nor is he wrongfully in possession, and hence he cannot be subjected to a suit, unless he has refused to surrender possession on demand;⁵¹ and the same rule applies where the sale is not completed because some of the heirs refused to convey their share.⁵²

§ 272. Liability of Representative for Unauthorized Sale

An executor or administrator is generally liable for the loss resulting from an unauthorized sale of real estate.

An executor or administrator is liable for the loss resulting from an unauthorized sale of real estate.⁵³ He is bound to show the necessity of the sale and to account for the value of the property, whether such value was realized at the sale or not.⁵⁴ Where an infant has been appointed administratrix and has without authority sold real estate of decedent, he may subsequently come into court and disaffirm the contract on the ground of fraud and minority, for the purpose of avoiding personal liability for the unauthorized sale.⁵⁵ An administrator, however, who sells estate property without authority is not personally liable to a mechanic's lienor for an unauthorized improvement thereon by the purchaser under contract with the mechanic's lienor, to which the administrator was not a party.⁵⁶

§ 273. Ratification of Unauthorized Sales

An unauthorized sale of real estate is binding on heirs and devisees who ratify it.

An unauthorized sale of real estate by the executor or administrator is binding on the heirs or devisees if it is ratified by them,⁵⁷ or by their ancestor,⁵⁸ as where without fraud or mistake they receive the proceeds from such sale;⁵⁹ and where such heirs are also heirs of the executor, so that if the executor did not account for such proceeds to their ancestors they must have received them through descent from the executor, they cannot assert title to the property without accounting for the proceeds.⁶⁰ A minor devisee is not bound by his assent to the executor's sale of real property.⁶¹ An agreement to sell real estate by an administratrix before she had a license from the court to do so is not so against public policy and void as to prevent its ratification after she has obtained a license.⁶²

3. SALE UNDER TESTAMENTARY AUTHORITY

§ 274. Power to Sell

- a. In general
- b. Discretionary or mandatory power; compelling exercise
- c. Incidental powers

a. In General

An executor may sell the testator's real estate for any lawful purpose to which the testator wishes the proceeds to be applied where such power is, either expressly or impliedly, conferred on him by the will.

An executor may sell his testator's real estate for the payment of debts or for any other lawful purpose to which the testator wishes the proceeds of his real estate to be applied where such power is, either expressly or impliedly, conferred on him by the provisions of the testator's will,⁶³ and the object or purpose of the power is specified in, or clearly ascertainable from, the will.⁶⁴ Such a power of sale cannot be determined on the consent of the beneficiaries,⁶⁵ but depends on the testator's intention as ascertained from the language of the whole will,⁶⁶ and effect will be given to that intention if it can be done consistently with the rules of law.⁶⁷ The power to sell need not be conferred in any particular words or phrases, it being sufficient that the will shows that such was the testator's intent.⁶⁸

It has been said that an executor derives his power to act as such in the transfer of immovable property from a compliance with the law of the place where he attempts to operate under the will and not from the will alone,⁶⁹ and that the executor must take out letters testamentary in order lawfully to exercise the power which the testator has thus conferred on him,⁷⁰ but where, before issuance of letters testamentary, the executor contracts to sell and deliver a bond for title at a future date, and offers on that date, after receipt of letters testamentary, to perform his obligations and execute such bond, it constitutes a ratification of the original obligation or an acceptance of the buyer's outstanding offer,⁷¹ and the purchaser's refusal to comply with his obligations amounts to a breach.⁷² On the other hand, it has been held that the right to sell and convey, under a general power of sale, depends on the will

itself, and not on the issuance of letters testamentary,⁷³ and that an executor need not fully qualify as such before making a sale, where the legal estate is devised to him merely for the purpose of sale,⁷⁴ or where the will shows that it is the testator's desire that the court assume no other control over his estate than to probate his will and record an inventory of the property, and expressly exempts the executors from giving bonds, and authorizes them to sell at their discretion any of testator's land.⁷⁵

An executor's right to sell, under testamentary power, is superior to the right of partition vested in one who has purchased an undivided interest from a devisee;⁷⁶ and it is not limited because not coupled with an interest⁷⁷ or affected by the pendency of a suit by a creditor for a settlement of the estate;⁷⁸ nor is a power of sale for the purpose of paying testator's debts affected by the widow's dissent from the will⁷⁹ or by a power given in another part of the will to sell after the death or remarriage of the widow.⁸⁰ A power to sell is not inconsistent with a power to manage until a sale can be effected;⁸¹ nor is it abrogated by a further provision directing the interest and rents of the property to be used for a certain purpose.⁸² A power to sell and invest the proceeds until the beneficiaries entitled thereto attain their majority is not inconsistent with a prior provision devising a certain part of the remainder of the estate to each of such beneficiaries.⁸³ A direction to an executor to sell real estate, the proceeds to become part of the residuary estate of the testator, has been held to be ineffectual as a power of sale where the will makes no disposition of the residuary estate,⁸⁴ but where real estate is devised to executors in trust to sell and distribute the proceeds among designated beneficiaries, and a share thereof passes to testator's heirs by reason of the invalidity of the devise of that share, the whole property is subject to the exercise of the power of sale, provided a sale is necessary to carry out to the best advantage the valid provisions of the will.⁸⁵ A power to sell under a will devising the fee to residuary devisees is a naked power only, and not a power coupled with an interest.⁸⁶

Construction of power. A court of probate jurisdiction may construe a power of sale given to an executor;⁸⁷ and the law of the testator's domicile, rather than the law of the state where the land is located, governs in the construction of such a power.⁸⁸ A power of sale, should receive a liberal construction in order to effect the true purpose and intent of the testator,⁸⁹ and should be construed as granting an unconditional, rather than a limited, power of sale, where both constructions are appropriate.⁹⁰

Injunction. A sale of land, under a will, may be enjoined at the instance of the heirs where the validity of the will is in controversy, and it has been admitted to probate without notice to the heirs and on insufficient testimony,⁹¹ or where the sale is being made without proper authority therefor;⁹² and

For benefit of devisee

Where a will directed a sale of all the real and personal estate of testatrix by the administrator for the benefit of a devisee, a further provision directing the interest and rents of the property to be used for the maintenance and education of the devisee did not abrogate the direction to the administrator to sell, since by the word "rents" the testatrix meant that, so long as the real estate remained unsold, the income arising therefrom, as well as the interest from the proceeds of the personal estate, should be applied to the support and education of the devisee.—Betty v. a sale for the payment of debts barred by limitation may be enjoined at the instance of grantees of devisees of the land sought to be sold.⁹³ Creditors of the estate by account cannot enjoin the executor from selling real estate on the ground that he is insolvent, where no waste or mismanagement or attempt thereat is alleged.⁹⁴

b. Discretionary or Mandatory Power; Compelling Exercise

A power of sale may be discretionary, as where its exercise is left to the discretion of the executor; or it may be mandatory, as where an absolute duty to sell is imposed on the executor.

The power of sale may be either discretionary or mandatory.⁹⁵ A power to sell is discretionary where the executor is authorized, but not directed, to sell,⁹⁶ and the power is not coupled with a trust or with any interest in the donee;⁹⁷ that is, the executor is given the power to make a sale but it is left to his discretion as to whether the power shall be exercised.⁹⁸ Such a discretionary power creates a personal trust independent of the donee's official character as executor,⁹⁹ and it should not be exercised except to serve some good purpose,¹ and it need not be exercised in the absence of necessity;² and where a sale would be prejudicial to the interests of a life tenant it should not be exercised unless the sale is necessary to protect the testator's estate.³ The executor may go into court for direction and guidance in the matter,⁴ but unless he does so of his own accord the courts will not as a rule interpose to control him in an honest exercise of a discretion or a power with regard to the sale of decedent's real estate vested in him by the will,⁵ unless the circumstances are such that the sale or a refusal to sell amounts to fraud or an abuse of discretion,⁶ in which case the court may compel a sale,⁷ but it cannot direct that the sale be made by a commissioner or referee unless it is charged or found that the executor is unfit or without capacity to make the sale.⁸

A power to sell is mandatory where it imposes on the executor an absolute duty to sell, leaving him no discretion whatever in the matter,⁹ or leaving him discretion merely as to the time and manner of

Permissive subordinate to positive direction

A will directing executors to convert testator's estate into cash or other property readily divisible in kind imposed duty on them to sell testator's realty, notwithstanding subsequent provision permitting them to retain any form of investment of which he died seized, "having in mind my desires above expressed."—In re Cullen's Estate, supra.

the sale¹⁰ or as to the disposition of the proceeds.¹¹ A power of sale may also be regarded as mandatory where it is granted for a purpose which cannot be carried out without a sale.¹² A mandatory power to sell on the decease of the wife, who predeceased the testator, takes effect on the death of the testator.¹³ In the case of a mandatory direction, it is well settled that if the executor neglects or refuses to sell the court may compel him to do so at the instance of an interested person,¹⁴ and such persons only may be joined as parties who have interests in the property which might be affected.¹⁵

A power of sale includes the power to do such acts or make such agreements as may be necessary and proper to make an advantageous sale; but it generally does not include the power to exchange the property for other property.

As incidental to the power of sale, an executor may do such acts or make such agreements as may be necessary and proper to bring about an advantageous sale.¹⁶ Where the title to land, as well as a power of sale, is given to executors, it has been held that they can make an agreement to assign a part to the widow for dower, in consideration of her releasing the residue, which, in the absence of collusion, will bind the heirs as well as creditors;¹⁷ and it has been considered that the executor may also, as incidental to the power of sale, create easements, such as the right to use part of the property as a street, when the most advantageous mode of exercising the power is by dividing the property into building lots.¹⁸ However, a will authorizing executors to sell and convey the coal underlying certain of the testator's lands, with the usual mining privileges, does not give them power to waive or release the right of surface or lateral support.¹⁹ An unrestricted power of sale does not authorize a confession of judgment.²⁰

Contracts of sale; options. Where the will directs an executor to sell property with discretion as to terms and conditions, he has power to make a contract of sale and to enforce specific performance thereof,²¹ and in such a case a judgment may be entered that defendant specifically perform, and, if he refuse to do so, that the property be sold by a referee, whose deed to the purchaser will convey all the title which the executor could have conveyed under the power in the will.²² The contract of sale may also be enforced against the executor,²³ and

Demand and refusal

Under will directing property to be sold and divided equally among testator's grandchildren and nephew, one of the grandchildren had no cause of action for sale and division of proceeds, in absence of allegation that demand had been made on executor to sell land and that he had refused to do so.—Harlow v. Riley's Ex'r, 138 S.W.2d 946, 282 Ky. 437.

A decree in a proceeding to compel executors to comply with the terms of a will requiring a sale of land should direct the executors to proceed to sell the real estate and make report to the court of the sale, with the necessary expenses thereof, so that the court may be apprised of their compliance with the decree.—Cannon v. Garrett, 268 Ill.App. 18.

Costs

In a proceeding to compel executors to comply with the terms of a will as to the sale of property and the division of its proceeds, there was no error in decreeing that the costs of the suit be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, there being nothing to show an abuse of discretion by the chancellor.—Cannon v. the fact that the title is encumbered does not relieve him from liability for specific performance of the contract.²⁴ However, an executor who is empowered to sell cannot give an option on the property.²⁵

Exchanges. A mere power to sell given to an executor does not authorize him to exchange the land, either in whole or in part, for other land,²⁶ and consequently a contract of sale by which the executor agrees to accept other land in part payment, at a stipulated price, is void.²⁷ Where, however, a testator expressly impresses the character of realty on the proceeds of sale of his real estate during the existence of a life estate given by the will, and expressly confers power on his executor to sell his real estate and with the proceeds purchase other real estate and to continue the transfer and disposition thereof in his discretion, this power authorizes a direct exchange.²⁸

§ 275. — Implied Power

An executor's power to sell real estate may be implied where it is clear from the provisions of the will that the testator intended him to have such power, or the directions of the will are such that a power of sale is necessary in order that they may be properly carried out.

An executor's power to sell real estate need not be expressly given in terms by the will, but it may be implied,²⁹ when the provisions of the will render it reasonable to do so,³⁰ that is, when it is clear that the testator intended that his executor should have such power or the directions of the will are such that a power of sale is necessary in order that they may be properly carried out.³¹ The courts, however, will not put a strained construction on the language of the will in order to extract such a power from it when the testator's intention to give or the necessity for such a power is not clear.³² Power to manage and control does not authorize a sale of the land;³³ and the mere fact that a sale would be beneficial to the estate is not sufficient to raise an implied power of sale, where this is not necessary to carry out the provisions of the will.³⁴

A power of sale is implied where the residue after the payment of debts is devised to the executor,³⁵ but not where such residuary devise is to a person other than the executor;³⁶ and no power of sale can be implied from the mere fact that the bequests under the will exceed the amount of the testator's personalty.³⁷ A power of sale is implied where land is devised to the executor for purposes naturally devolving upon him³⁸ or requiring a sale;³⁹ and it has been considered that the use of terms applicable to personalty particularly and exclusively indicates that all the property is to be converted into personalty and gives an implied power of sale.⁴⁰ A power of sale is not implied solely from a general direction to pay debts,⁴¹ and a charge of debts on the realty has been held not, of itself, sufficient to raise an implied power of sale;⁴² but where a testator directs the payment of debts and legacies with the proceeds of real estate, or otherwise manifests an intent that the proceeds of his real estate should be so used, the executor takes a power of sale by implication.⁴³

A mere direction to distribute or divide an estate consisting in whole or in part of realty is not of itself sufficient to raise an implied power of sale, if a division in kind can be effected,⁴⁴ but it is otherwise where a sale is necessary to effect a distribution, or the testator apparently contemplated that a sale should be made for that purpose;⁴⁵ and, a fortiori, a will directing that testator's real estate shall be converted into money and that his executor shall distribute his estate among named beneficiaries empowers the executors to sell the real estate.⁴⁶ So also a power of sale is implied where the testator blends the proceeds of real estate into one fund with the personalty for the purpose of distribution or accumulation or even where there is no direction to distribute.⁴⁷ A devise to an executor with directions to invest and pay over or distribute the

Division in kind favored

In determining whether an executor is vested with an implied power to sell real estate of decedent and whether a sale is necessary in order to carry out the express powers given, the court should keep in mind that the law favors the division of property in kind rather than a sale of it followed by a division of the proceeds.—Walker's Trustee v. Walker, 244 S.W. 772, 196 Ky. 346.

That the executor has not enough money to equalize advancements to the legatees as provided by the will is not sufficient to require a sale of the whole property in order to effectuate an equalization in its division where the property is such that it can be divided in kind.—Walker's Trustee v. income or proceeds is generally held to give him implied power to sell real estate so devised in order to carry out the will;⁴⁸ but it is always a question of the intention of the testator, and if from the general tenor of the will it appears that it was not intended by such direction to give power to the executor to sell none will be implied.⁴⁹ Where there is an express devise of land to persons named in the will, there can be no power of sale in the executor by implication,⁵⁰ and even a charge of legacies on land devised beneficially does not give the executor any power of sale.⁵¹ An unexecuted parol agreement to convey land creates against the promisor no debt or liability for the payment of which his executor will have implied power to sell land belonging to the estate.⁵² authority to sell at his discretion, as prudence may dictate, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the will. If the power is limited it can be exercised only under the circumstances and for the purposes provided for or contemplated in the will.

§ 276. — Extent of Power; Purpose of Sale

A general power of sale usually gives the executor

It is usually considered that, where executors are given a general power of sale, they may sell at their discretion, as prudence may dictate, during the continuance of the trust.⁵³ Such a discretionary power, however, is construed with, and strictly limited by, the primary obligations which are inherent in the office of executor,⁵⁴ and is to be exercised only in aid of other powers and duties devolving on him⁵⁵ in carrying out the testator's intention or purposes, as construed from the provisions of the will,⁵⁶ and, when necessary, such power may be exercised for the purpose of providing funds for a judicial final accounting by, and compensation to, the executor.⁵⁷ A general power of sale, however, must not be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously,⁵⁸ and it cannot be exercised to destroy an essential quality of the

"Any lawful purpose" limited by specific enumeration

Under will authorizing executors to sell specifically devised realty "for any lawful purpose and especially for the purpose of raising money needed for debts, inheritance taxes and expenses of administration," meaning of phrase "any lawful purpose" was limited by specific enumeration following on the principle of "noscitur a sociis," and the executors were not authorized to sell such realty for purpose of setting up a reserve fund equal to a contingent claim against estate of holder of a bond secured by mortgage on realty which had been conveyed by deceased before his death.—In re Reilly's Will, 24 N.Y.S.2d 213, 175 Misc. 597.

Contingent claim

A contingent claim of holder of bond secured by mortgage on realty which had been conveyed by deceased before his death against estate, in which it was asserted that a reserve fund equal to full amount of bond should be set up to protect holder against any deficiency which might result on foreclosure of mortgage, was not a "debt" within accepted connotation of that term as employed in law of decedent estates defining a "debt" as every claim and demand on which a judgment for a sum of money or directing the payment of money, could be recovered in an action.—In re Reilly's Will, supra.

Sale advised

A will stating that, for equal division, testatrix advised executors to sell the houses she owned, confers on the executors the power to sell the property in order to make

sions on the subject, for reinvestment.⁶⁸ Where power is given to sell if necessary for certain purposes, the necessity must appear in order to uphold a sale,⁶⁹ even though the sale would be to the advantage of the estate;⁷⁰ but, where the power is to sell if, in the opinion of the executor, it is necessary for a particular purpose, the necessity need not be shown.⁷¹ A power of sale for administrative purposes alone cannot be exercised unless such purposes require a sale.⁷² Where the testator directed his "executrix" to sell his property and in a subsequent clause appointed his wife executrix, the wife had no power in her individual capacity to sell for her own use.⁷³ Power to carry on the testator's business and sell his property authorizes a conveyance of land belonging to the estate to secure debts incurred in carrying on the business.⁷⁴

Extent of authority

Under a will authorizing executors to sell realty and any stocks, bonds, securities, or other evidences of indebtedness which testator had at death and to reinvest the same in other realty or in such securities as might be for best interests of estate, the use of the word "authorize" did not manifest an intention by testator to direct executors to do certain things and not to do things not specifically authorized, as regards executors' authority to retain property which testator left and to sell and reinvest in nonlegals.—In re Greenawalt's Estate, supra.

As part of original realty

Clauses of will, authorizing executors to sell realty not specifically devised, reinvest proceeds in other realty, and hold latter in place of that sold, and directing that realty not specifically devised remain unsold and be kept together until deaths of both testator's widow and daughter, to whom he gave life estates therein, but that net income thereof be paid to them monthly, mean that executors could sell realty only for reinvestment and that lands bought with proceeds must be treated as if part of original realty until falling in of life estates.—Amos v. Toolen, 168 So. 687, 232 Ala. 587.

Application of statute

A statute providing that a trustee may invest funds in land by leave of court provided that the investment be advantageous, and no change be made in the course of succession by such change of investment, as regards the heirs or next of kin of the cestui que trust, does not apply to an investment of funds made by an executor under authority of the will to sell certain property and invest the proceeds in other suitable property.—Wilcox v. Hollar, 222 P. 758, 115 Kan. 27.

Sale not necessary

Where a will, making no disposition of the personal estate, and having no residuary clause, contains the following provision: "I authorize my executor to sell and convey," certain land "for the purpose of discharging all my debts," the direction does not indicate an intention that the personality shall be relieved from its primary liability for the payment of the debts, and, therefore, the executor cannot sell the land to the widow when they both know that there is more than enough personality to pay the debts.—Sweeney v. Warren, 28 N.E. 413, 127 N.Y. 426, 24 Am.S.R. 468.

*Approval or consent of interested persons is necessary before the power of sale can be exercised, where the will or a statute so provides;*⁷⁵ and, if the consent of a majority of the persons interested in the estate is required and some are dead, the consent of a majority of the entire original number is still necessary.⁷⁶ Until such consent is given the executor should act as trustee in collecting and distributing the rent of the unsold property.⁷⁷

§ 277. — Control of Courts

A testamentary power of sale ordinarily may be exercised without a court order or license, unless it is required by the will or by statute; but the exercise of such power may be subject to the supervisory control of the probate court.

A testator may lawfully clothe the executor with power to sell real estate without the necessity of

Widow

(1) Testamentary direction to sell real property and distribute proceeds authorized sale only on securing widow's consent, where will further required that executor secure her consent before making sale.—In re Harrington's Estate, 248 N.Y.S. 785, 139 Misc. 97.

(2) Where the will authorized sale of unremunerative property in the discretion of executor, subject to a provision requiring him to secure consent of the widow, he had power to sell unprofitable land and reinvest proceeds, where she in writing consented thereto.—Shannonhouse v. Fleetwood, 100 S.E. 889, 178 N.C. 417.

Sale on request

Under will giving life estate to testatrix' husband, son, and unmarried daughter, and providing that residue of shares of life tenants on death of survivor should be given to testatrix' married daughters, husband and son, on death of unmarried daughter, are entitled to invade principal of estate for their needs, each to extent of his interest therein at time of such invasion, and hence realty could be sold by executrices on request of husband and son or survivor.—In re Voges' Estate, 277 N.Y.S. 776, 154 Misc. 224.

A statute requiring the consent of the heirs to a sale for the payment of funeral expenses and legacies does not require the intervention of the heirs to a sale for the payment of debts contracted by the testator.—Martinez v. The Registrar of Property, 15 Puerto Rico 66.

receiving the sanction of the court, as a prerequisite to such a sale;⁷⁸ and, ordinarily, where a testamentary power of sale is given to the executor, he may proceed to sell the realty without recourse to the courts for a license or order of court,⁷⁹ even though he has sought the aid of the court in other matters connected with the settlement of the estate;⁸⁰ but this rule does not apply to a substituted executor who has not the same absolute power to sell as had the original executor.⁸¹ The executor's power to sell without a court order or license is not affected by a statute which requires persons licensed by the probate court to give bond before proceeding to sell,⁸² or which requires the sale to be reported to, and ratified by, the probate court,⁸³ or by a statute which authorizes the interposition of claims where the sale is proceeding under an order of court;⁸⁴ and it has been held that, where the will gives power to the executor to sell land in case of a deficiency of assets, he must sell under the power and not under the statute authorizing sales by leave of the probate court,⁸⁵ but the fact that a judicial sale is made unnecessarily does not affect the title of the purchaser, if a fair price is realized.⁸⁶ A void sale under order of court cannot be supported as an exercise of a power of sale under the will;⁸⁷

but the executor may afterward convey the land to the grantee by virtue of a power of sale which, through ignorance of the law, he did not know he possessed when he executed the first instrument.⁸⁸

Where, however, an order of court is required by statute, the executor cannot sell without such order, even though the will authorizes him to sell without the consent of any person or court.⁸⁹ So, where the will, although empowering the executor to sell, declares that this power is subject to the assent or an order of court first being had, the executor cannot convey land without the concurrence of the court in, or confirmation by the court of, his contract of sale;⁹⁰ and, where a testamentary power of sale is conferred for a particular purpose, it cannot be sold for another purpose without leave of court.⁹¹

Supervisory control. Although a sale of realty, under testamentary power, does not primarily require an order or confirmation by the probate court, it is subject to the supervisory control of such court, under a statute giving it power to control executors in the management of estates and the disposition of property,⁹² or, in a proper case, such control may be exercised by a court of equity.⁹³ Effect cannot be given to a testamentary provision that no part of the estate should be subject to any court of equity, if in order to carry out testamentary provisions as to the sale of real property it is found necessary to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity.⁹⁴

§ 278. — Revocation or Termination

A testamentary power of sale generally continues until it is revoked, or until it is terminated by the accomplishment or cessation of the purpose for which it was granted.

In the absence of revocation, a testamentary power of sale generally continues as long as there remains unfulfilled objects or purposes of the testator in aid of which it was intended that the power should or might be exercised;⁹⁵ and whether it extends beyond the period that the executor is to perform his ordinary legal duties in settling the personal estate depends on the intention of the testator as determined from the will.⁹⁶

by a codicil substituting other executors for those named in the will,⁹⁸ by the subsequent birth of issue not provided for by the will,⁹⁹ by the remarriage of the widow and executrix,¹ by the oral assent of the executor to an oral partition of the land between the devisees,² by his asking the intervention of the court for the benefit of minor beneficiaries,³ or by the filing of a caveat to revoke the probate of the will.⁴ Neither does the death of the sole beneficiary under a will, before the executor has sold property of the estate to pay the debts, as directed by the will, deprive the executor of that power.⁵ An order settling the estate and discharging the executor has been held not to revoke the executor's power of sale;⁶ but there is authority to the contrary.⁷

However, if a sale is directed for a specified purpose, the power to sell terminates with the purpose for which it was created,⁸ as where the purpose has become unattainable.⁹ Where the testator directs realty to be sold by his executor and the proceeds divided, the power becomes inoperative if the beneficiaries under the will elect to take the property as realty and retain it without conversion,¹⁰ provid-

Extent of control

The power of the orphans' court to control the power of sale of real estate vested in executors is limited to cases in which by reason of fraud, accident, or mistake a strong appeal can be made for the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction.—In re Andrews' Estate, 6 Pa. Dist. 24.

A controversy concerning a testamentary power of sale and its exercise by the executors is cognizable in the probate court.—In re McCafferty's Will, 264 N.Y.S. 38, 147 Misc. 179.

Partition in lieu of proceeds

Where testatrix, who was seized of an undivided one half of a tract of realty, devised the realty as part of her residuary estate to several persons, one of whom was the owner of the other undivided one half, and she empowered her executor to sell any or all of her realty, and, in suit to which the executor was a party, the tract was partitioned among all owners, and several years thereafter the executor, acting under the power of sale, conveyed part of the tract, the partition was ined all beneficially interested concur.¹¹ It has been held that a power to sell with the consent of a designated person terminates on the death of such person without having consented,¹² although it is otherwise where it is apparent that the intention of the testator was merely to require the consent of such person if living, and to continue the power after his death,¹³ or that the requirement of such consent was subordinate to the principal purpose and intention of the will.¹⁴ A discretionary power conferred on executors jointly has been held to terminate with the death of one of them.¹⁵ A power of sale given to an executor virtute officii ceases on the termination of his duties as executor, and cannot afterward be exercised by him, although he continues to act under the will as trustee.¹⁶ The filing of a bill for partition by a tenant in common suspends the power of sale and, if the partition is ordered, the power to sell is terminated.¹⁷

§ 279. Who May Exercise Power

Where the testator so directs, a sale of real property is to be made by the executor, and the same is true where testator fails to specify who shall exercise the power of sale as to a sale which is directed or authorized, provided the executor has the duty to see to the application of the proceeds, and the testator has nominated an executor.

It is axiomatic that, where a testator authorizes or directs his executor to sell his real property, the executor is the proper person to make the sale,¹⁸ consistent with the continuance of the executor's power of sale, and hence the power was thereby cut off, and the executor's deed did not convey marketable title.—Satchwell v. Warner, 14 A.2d 527, 127 N.J.Eq. 544, affirmed, 19 A.2d 830, 129 N.J.Eq. 384.

Where neither of life tenants does anything showing election to extinguish such power, remainderman's conveyance of his interest before termination of life estate does not destroy power of sale.—Bettinger v. Montgomery, supra.

Identity of interests

A power of sale of land vested in an executor cannot be defeated by an election of the heirs at law to reconvert the personalty into realty, except by the unanimous action of the beneficiaries, and then only when their interests in the land as cestuis que trust and heirs at law are identical.—*Cranstoun v. Change of designation

(1) Where the testatrix, who gave the one originally named as executor unlimited power to sell real estate, on the death of such person named new executors, conferring on them all the power and authority of the original executor, the substituted executors had full power of sale.—Magie v. Kirkpatrick, 112 A. 725, 92 N.J.Eq. 386.

(2) Such persons exercise the power in their representative, and not in their individual, capacity.—Magie v. Kirkpatrick, supra.

Husband executor in right of wife

Prior to statutes removing the disability of coverture, where a married woman is executrix of the estate of a third person with power to sell real property, such power could not be exercised by her husband as executor in right of the wife as to property the title to which was in the wife as trustee.—May v. Frazee, 14 Ky. 391, 4 Litt. 391, 14 Am.D. 159.

Substitutionary designee

(1) Where by codicil another person is appointed executor in case the person first appointed predeceases testatrix, and such event occurs, the power of sale given by the will to the person named as executor is held by the substitutionary executor where the codicil expressly ratifies and reaffirms all provisions of the will not in conflict with the codicil.—In re Maier's Will, 205 N.Y.S. 156, 123 Misc. 244.

(2) A testamentary power of sale only to substitutionary executor and executrix, and not to the original nominee, who is given only a life estate, has the effect of preventing exercise of the power of sale by such original nominee.—Ranhofer v. A. C. & H. M. Hall Realty Co., 128 N.Y.S. 230, 143 App.Div. 237.

Nature of power of sale

(1) Whether the power of sale given executors by a will is personal or one attaching to the office depends on the construction of the will.

Miss.—Clark v. Hornthal, 47 Miss. 434.

(2) Thus, under a will authorizing executors to sell and dispose of real estate at such times and in such manner as they may deem expedient, and for the best interests of all concerned, without license from any court, the proceeds to be equally divided between the testator's children and the issue of any deceased child, the power is attached to the office, and can be exercised by the executors, or the survivor of them, until the purposes for which it was given are effectuated or become impossible of accomplishment.—New England Trust Co. v. Morse, 136 N.E. 835, 243 Mass. 39.

(3) So, executor's absolute, non-discretionary power under will to sell realty is not personal, but official, and must be exercised during executorship.—Rawlings v. Rawlings, 58 S.W.2d 735, 332 Mo. 503, reversing 45 S.W.2d 539, 226 Mo. App. 688, transferred, see, Sup., 39 S.W.2d 367.

(4) On the other hand, a clause in a will which reads "If the executors shall at any time find it necessary, or shall deem it for the best interest of my estate, I desire a sale to be made" is construed to imply a personal confidence and trust in the judgment and honesty of the parties named, and to impose a personal power of sale.—Bennett v. Chapin, 43 N.W. 893, 77 Mich. 526, 7 L.R.A. 377.

(5) So a will devising real estate to a beneficiary for life, with gift over to her descendants, and empowering the executor to sell the property and hold the avails in place of the real estate, and appointing a son of testatrix executor, confers on the executor a power of sale, which is purely personal and does not survive the executor.—Hart v.

although, except in some jurisdictions,¹⁹ such power does not continue after discharge from office.²⁰ Moreover, under statute, if the person appointed to sell refuses to perform the trust or dies before he has completed it, the sale should be made by the executor.²¹

It frequently happens, however, that a testator directs or authorizes a sale without expressly declaring by whom it shall be made, and in such case the rule is that the executor or executrix will take a power of sale by implication if the will imposes the duty to see to the application of the proceeds,²² but not otherwise.²³ Moreover, in such case of failure of the testator to designate the person to execute the power of sale, a statutory power in the executor to make the sale is deemed official and not personal.²⁴ However, where a will directing a sale of realty nominates no executor, the general rule is that there is no implied power of sale in anyone, and the only way a sale can legally be made is by an application to the court;²⁵ but, as stated infra §

1034, in some jurisdictions it is held that the power may be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed, and the mere fact that a testamentary power might, on the death of the executor, be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to appoint a person to execute the power where no such administrator has been appointed.²⁶

While as a general rule a discretionary power of sale given by a will cannot be delegated, the ministerial act of negotiating and consummating the sale may be delegated to an agent. The personal representative may ratify a sale made by an agent.

A discretionary power to sell land given by the will cannot be delegated,²⁷ but, although there is contrary authority,²⁸ an agent or attorney in fact, subject to the representative's supervision or approval, may be authorized to negotiate and make sales,²⁹ and a sale made by such agent or attorney

(6) However, it has been held that a personal trust, created by will conferring discretionary power of sale, survives final administration of estate and continues until trust purposes are accomplished or donee has had reasonable time to execute trust.—Rawlings v. Rawlings, supra. Exercise of power by administrator with will annexed see infra § 1034. Exercise of power by independent executor see infra § 1057. Where testatrix devised to her son in trust a certain farm, to be held for seven years for the use of her children, providing, however, that the farm might be sold at any time within such period if a majority of the children should elect, the executor had no implied power of sale over such real estate at the request of a majority of the children, but they alone could exercise control over the transfer of the title.—*Porterfield v. —Neal v. Patten, 47 Ga. 73—Cheever v. Hora, 22 Ga. 600.

(2) On the other hand, an administrator, having no discretion as to the sale, could delegate power of sale of real property.—Cheever v. Hora, supra.

In Georgia, even prior to statute, it was held that an executor could delegate the ministerial act of consummating the sale of real property, retaining supervision in himself.—Atkinson v. The Central Georgia Agricultural & Mfg. Co., 58 Ga. 227.

In Tennessee, under Act 1833 c 57, it was held that, where a will directs the sale of real estate to pay debts, the personal representative may delegate the power to sell to attorneys in fact.—Murdock v. Leath, 10 Heisk. 166.

Agent's authority to sell real prop-

§ 281. What Property May Be Sold

The provisions of the will as reasonably construed determine the property to be sold.

With reference to what property may be sold by the executor the provisions of the will must govern,³¹ as reasonably construed.³² A power to sell and dispose of any of the testator's "securities" does not authorize the executor to sell any land.³³

A general power of sale given the legal representatives will include realty acquired subsequent to the making of the will, where such is the clear and manifest intention of the testator.³⁴ Whether a sale of a homestead is authorized by such a general power depends on the testator's intention.³⁵ Under a power to sell lands executors cannot convey their testator's rights in land of which he died disseized, even to the disseizor.³⁶ A general power of sale has been held to authorize a sale of lands expressly devised, where such sale accorded with the testator's apparent intention,³⁷ but, under the decisions of the erty generally see Agency § 114 b (2).

Will construed

Provision in will that after death of testator's widow his children shall share equally in the money received from sale of real estate and personal property does not authorize sale of real estate not otherwise disposed of by the will.—*Andrews v. Marriage of widow

Where a widow is devised the use of a homestead during widowhood and, should she remarry, a portion of the proceeds of the estate both real and personal, and the personal representatives are empowered to sell all the estate, including the sale of the homestead after the widow's death, the general power of sale includes the right to sell the homestead after the widow remarries.—Huyler v. Kingsland, 11 N.J.Eq. 406.

Power "to sell lots of land, not including homestead," under the doctrine that an express exclusion is an implied inclusion of that not excluded, includes power to sell all realty other than the homestead, whether town or building lots, even though in other clauses the word "lot" is used in such restricted sense. Barnes v. First Baptist Church, 136 A. 266, 83 N.H. 503.

Power to sell to pay debts

(1) A provision that debts should be paid out of the personal property but if that should be insufficient the executors may sell so much of the realty as may be necessary for that purpose authorizes the sale of a homestead in such contingency.—Willier v. Cummings, 136 N.W. 559, 91 Neb. 571, Ann.Cas.1913D 287.

(2) The reason is that, since under the modern law of administration of estates realty is subject to the payment of debts, the testamentary provision for sale would be meaningless except as applicable to real property, such as a homestead, not usually subject to payment of testator's debts.—Willier v. Cummings, supra.

Real property subject to payment of testator's debts see infra § 479.

Reversionary interest

Where a testator, after devising a life estate in his home to his wife, directed that all his other real estate be sold, and he did not own any other real estate besides the home place, the clause "all my other real estate" referred to the reversionary interest in the home place, and the testator intended that such interest should be sold by his executors.—*Wallace v. courts on the subject, not otherwise.³⁸ A clause authorizing the executors to sell or rent any property which testator possessed at his death applies only to property not specifically devised.³⁹ A general power of sale will authorize the personal representatives to sell an unused burial lot, unless the lot was expressly purchased to afford a suitable resting place for the testator.⁴⁰ Where a will clearly indicates an intention that specific property be held in trust until the happening of a certain contingency, such property is not included in a general power of sale to the executor.⁴¹ A power to sell "any" real property has been held to mean "all,"⁴² and authority to sell "all and any part" of testator's realty has been construed to mean "all or any part" of the real estate of which testator died seized, and not to require that if any was sold, all should be sold.⁴³

The will may invest the personal representative with discretionary power to determine the property to be sold.⁴⁴ Thus, where an executor is empowered by the will to sell any portion of the real estate, he is vested with a discretion to determine what property shall be sold.⁴⁵ A power to sell and con-

(3) Real estate devised to testator's children after death of testator's wife under will providing that if not accepted by children within six months from wife's death such property should revert to residue of estate, which was devised in trust, could be sold by executors with written approval of wife in view of clauses in will appointing her as coexecutrix with power to appoint and remove other executors and authorizing executors to sell all of testator's property with wife's written consent and on such terms as she might fix.—*Dyer v. (4) A general power of sale, conferred on executors by will containing provision for gifts in residue which, although not gifts made expressly out of proceeds of sale of land, were gifts immediately to follow division of inclusive residue by executors, authorized executors to sell all real estate, notwithstanding small portion was to satisfy legacies that lapsed and others unforeseen by testator fell into residue, by reason of simultaneous death of himself and wife.—In re Strong's Will, 12 N.Y.S.2d 544, 171 Misc. 445.

General power of sale for purposes of reinvestment

(1) General power of sale for purposes of reinvestment does not apply to real property specifically devised, where obviously intended, in connection with a testamentary provision, for keeping the estate at large intact pending the majority of a beneficiary.—Harrison v. Harrison, 105 So. 179, 213 Ala. 418.

(2) Will, directing payment to testator's wife and daughter of monthly income from properties in which he gave them life estates, authorizing executors to sell realty not specifically devised and reinvest proceeds in other realty, directing that realty not specifically devised remain unsold and be kept together until both life tenants' deaths, and directing executors to sell entire estate and make distribution on termination of life estates, requires that all of estate not specifically devised be kept in executors' hands until falling in of life estates.—*Amos v. Sale of fixtures

A will, devising realty and a store thereon, but also providing for a bequest and devise of "all the rest, residue and remainder of my property of every kind except the store fixtures, which may be sold at public or private sale," etc., must be construed to mean power of sale to sell the residue, exclusive of store fixtures, which fall under the devise of the realty and store.—In re Squires' Will, 216 N.Y.S. 750, 127 Misc. 361.

Discretion not abused

A widow cannot complain that under a discretionary power of sale more land was sold than would have been necessary to pay debts, where if her claims had been allowed in full the proceeds would not have been more than was necessary for this purpose.—Harding v. Harding, 152 S.W. 259, 151 Ky. 398.

Homestead

(1) Under a provision that the homestead shall not be sold until necessary, and that it shall be used by wife and children, the executors have authority to sell it if it becomes necessary.—Etcheborne v. Auzerais, 45 Cal. 121.

(2) A will which provided that testator's wife should have her portion of the homestead, and further provided that the sons should have the use of the rest, and, whenever the interest of the estate required, that a portion should be platted, and so many of the lots sold as were necessary to create a fund sufficient to pay from the income the taxes and expenses of platting, did not authorize a sale of any portion of the homestead where it had not been platted.—Pettit v. Flint & P. M. R. Co., 72 N.W. 238, 114 Mich. 362.

Power not discretionary

Under will directing executor to sell realty, of which testatrix might die possessed, as soon after her death as in his "discretion" was to the best interest of the estate, the word "discretion" had reference to the time, circumstances, and conditions for making sale, and not to whether executor could exercise discretion of executing power of sale.—*Hoffman v. vey all the testator's real estate at their discretion is efficient to support a sale by the executors, not only of all the territorial extent of the lands whereof the testator died seized, but also of all his title and interest therein.⁴⁶ Where testator authorized his executors in their discretion to sell all of his real estate not specifically devised, except that devised to his wife, no part of which was to be sold without her consent, and also gave to his wife the income of certain buildings for life, or for as long as she should remain unmarried, the power of sale was only a power to sell the remainders in the lands devised for life.⁴⁷ Where a will provides that the residue of the estate be divided into eight equal parts and distributed to three beneficiaries, with discretionary power to the executors to sell realty for the purposes of residuary clause, mineral rights can be sold.⁴⁸

If the power given is to sell only certain specified realty, or only a certain part of the realty, the executor cannot sell any of the other realty without

§ 282. Notice to Heirs

The executor may have the duty of notifying heirs of his intention to sell realty.

§ 283. Time for Selling

Testamentary directions as to the time at which realty is to be sold should be followed, and if no time is specified by the testator the sale should be made within a reasonable time.

Where it appears from the entire will that testator intended to confer power to sell all his real property, but the clause of the will creating the power to sell limited such power to specific real property, other real property owned by testator may be sold by the executor, the limitation to the property specified being due to testator's mistaken belief he did not own such other property.—In re Dudek's Estate, 239 N.Y.S. 250, 136 Misc. 43.

Effect of time limitation in will

(1) A provision in a will limiting the time within which the sale of real property should be made has been construed to be merely directory.

Tex.—Allred v. Beggs, 84 S.W.3d 223, 125 Tex. 584, affirming Beggs v. Allred, Civ.App., 73 S.W.2d 599.

(2) So such provisions have been held to confer a discretionary power of sale within the periods specified, and a mandatory power thereafter.—In re Messmore's Estate, 138 A. 81, 290 Pa. 107—Fredericks v. Kerr, 68 A. 835, 129 Pa. 365—In re Snyder's Estate, 27 North. Co. 317—Wells v. Sloyer, 3 Pa.L.J. 203.

(3) Thus where decedent died January 9, 1908, and the will provided "my executor hereinafter named shall sell all my real estate as soon after my decease, as to him shall seem meet, not however to exceed three years thereafter" the power of sale could be exercised in 1940.—In re Snyder's Estate, 27 North. Co. 317.

(4) Similarly, a testamentary provision for the sale of real estate within a specified time has been held to impose a duty on the executor to sell within such time, but not to prevent a sale thereafter.—Trudeau v. Collins, R.I., 16 A.2d 346.

Testamentary clause limiting time of administration does not limit the time within which a discretionary power of sale of the personal representative may be exercised.

Compelling execution of power

If an executor fails to act pursuant to a direction that he shall sell real estate within a certain time, he may be compelled by a court of equity to sell, even after the lapse of such time.

decisions such a sale has been held to be improper⁵⁴ unless authorized by the court.⁵⁵ The time for the conversion of property may be extended by the agreement of all persons interested.⁵⁶

If no time for the sale is fixed by the will, it is discretionary with the executor when he will sell,⁵⁷ and while this rule is subject to the limitation that it is his duty to sell within a reasonable time,⁵⁸ a long lapse of time since the probate of a will does not constitute any objection to the exercise of a

What constitutes reasonable time

A reasonable time within the meaning of the text rule depends on the circumstances of the particular case showing what is to the best interest of the estate.

Awaiting improved conditions

(1) Where will directed executor to convert realty into personalty as soon after testator's death as practicable, executor was authorized to delay sale at least a reasonable time until conditions improved, if parties interested did not force early sale.—Parker v. Milam, 61 S.W.2d 674, 166 Tenn. 266.

(2) However, the mere fact that the market is unfavorable does not excuse an indefinite postponement of the sale.—Bryant v. Fingerlos, 295 N.W. 896, 138 Neb. 867, 132 A.L.R. 1467.

(3) Right of executor to exercise power of sale given by will is forfeited, he having delayed for over two years, and his only excuse being that the market was not favorable, and that a tenant in common would not consent to a sale for any amount he could obtain.—Vierieg v. Krehmke, 127 N.E. 735, 293 Ill. 265.

Securing true value

Executor's power, under will, to dispose of testator's realty, should be exercised as speedily as true value of realty could be realized.—In re Rosenberg's Estate, 261 N.Y.S. 640, 145 Misc. 581.

Compelling exercise of power

Where an executor has testamentary power to sell real estate, an action may be brought to compel him to do so.—Jones v. Hext, Tex.Civ. App. 67 S.W.2d 441, 445, citing Corpus Juris.

Particular delays considered

(1) Where power of sale resulted in equitable conversion of testator's realty into personalty at time of his death, reasonable time for executrices to sell realty was one year after date of letters testamentary.—In re Schuster's Will, 269 N.Y.S. 546, 150 Misc. 444.

(2) Thus where will empowered executor to sell, lease, or mortgage the real estate and in his discretion to hold it until such time as a fair value could be obtained for it, nine months was not a "reasonable time" to enable the executor to exercise the power given him in the will, in absence of special facts and circumstances, so as to permit maintenance of action at the end of nine months for partition and sale of the property.—Kesterke v. Van Wie, 20 N.Y. S.2d 497, 259 App.Div. 981.

(3) Where testatrix expressly directed that executrix should sell property, pay off bequests, and keep remainder for herself, power of executrix to sell had expired where she refused and neglected to exercise the power for a period of nearly fifteen years.—Bryant v. Fingerlos, 295 N.W. 896, 138 Neb. 867, 132 A. L.R. 1467.

(4) Where a will giving the executrix the use of property until her death or marriage, and providing that if she preferred the premises might be sold and the proceeds divided between her and two others, and that after her death or marriage the premises should be sold and the proceeds divided between such other legatees, also authorized the executrix "to sell my real estate as hereinbefore provided," it gave her no authority to sell the property after occupying it for twenty years before electing to take one third of the proceeds.—In re Britt's Will, 182 N. W. 738, 174 Wis. 145.

Liability of executor in case of delay

(1) Culpable negligence results where executor fails to comply with mandatory power of sale in will within reasonable period.—In re Taft's Will, 259 N.Y.S. 887, 144 Misc. 896, modifying 256 N.Y.S. 732, 143 Misc. 387, and affirmed 260 N. Y.S. 294, 145 Misc. 435.

(2) Executor who is vested with discretion in the sale of real estate is not liable for delaying the sale longer than necessary where he is guilty of no fraud but only of a mistake of judgment.—In re Cunningham, 61 A. 896, 212 Pa. 451—In re Cunningham, 61 A. 893, 212 Pa. 441.

power to sell real estate, if the duty to sell it still exists,⁵⁹ although it may, it has been held, enable the heirs or devisees to prevent the execution of the power and take possession of the land and dispose of it as they may deem proper, if they consider that course more to their interest than a sale under the will.⁶⁰

Where an executor is given power to hold and manage realty, or to rent it, or to sell it, he is not required to elect at the outset of his administration which course he will pursue, but, after managing it for a time and renting it for a time, may exercise the power of sale.⁶¹

If the will directs a sale to be made at a future time, or on the happening of a contingency, it is apparent that the power does not exist until the time arrives or the contingency happens, and if a sale is made prior thereto it is void,⁶² unless the will gives authority to the executor, at his discretion, to sell at a time other than that named in the will,⁶³ although some cases have considered that, where the sale was to be made on the happening of a contingency which was sure to happen, the executor might sell before it actually happened, where the beneficiaries consented.⁶⁴ Executors who are directed to sell on the happening of a certain event, are not,

however, bound to sell as soon as the event happens, on any terms or for any price that may be offered, but they are to see that the price and terms are reasonable, satisfactory, fair, and adequate and that the property is not sacrificed needlessly for some nominal amount.⁶⁵ A testamentary power, to sell real property when necessary for the welfare of specified persons must be exercised, if at all, during the life of the persons specified.⁶⁶

It has been held that the executor should not sell while there is a cloud on the title of the land, which affects its value.⁶⁷ The power of an executor to sell real estate to distribute the estate cannot be exercised after devisees have conveyed a part of their interests in the estate.⁶⁸

While a probate court will entertain an application for advice and direction as to the time for a sale of real property under testamentary power, the power is sparingly exercised, and only in exceptional cases.⁶⁹

§ 284. Manner and Conduct of Sale

Subject to testamentary directions and to statutory provisions, an executor has discretion as to the manner and conduct of a sale of real property under testamentary power of sale. As a general rule a public sale is required; while this rule has been applied in the case of a gen-

Statutory period for administration

Acceleration

(1) Where testator devised estate to wife for life and named her as executor, and "upon her death" gave his estate to executor to be thereafter appointed in trust to sell and distribute the proceeds, as soon "after her death" as practicable, and widow was released as executrix and conveyed life estate to substituted executor, widow terminated life estate and time for sale by substituted executor, if properly appointed, was accelerated and his power to sell became operative immediately.—Huhning v. National Standard Co., 12 A.2d 632, 127 N.J.Eq. 243.

(2) However, it has been held that where will authorized executor to sell land only after death of widow and to divide proceeds among children, voluntary conveyance of life estate by widow does not accelerate remainders, and hence there is no acceleration of power to sell.—Aldenderfer v. Spangler, 153 N.E. 517, 23 Ohio App. 133.

An executor who is given a power of sale by the will has, as a rule, considerable discretion as to the manner and conduct thereof,⁷⁰ but of course any directions given in the will are controlling,⁷¹ and under applicable statutes in the absence of directions in the will the sale must be conducted in all respects as if made under order of court.⁷²

The general rule is that a sale of real property by a personal representative under testamentary power of sale must be by public sale.⁷³ So it is held, in some instances by reason of applicable statutes, that a general or naked testamentary power of sale merely dispenses with the necessity of an order to sell,⁷⁴ and does not permit a private sale.⁷⁵ However, it is more generally held that where there is a general power of sale without a specification of public sale, a private sale is both permissible and customary,⁷⁶ or the sale may be by public auction.⁷⁷ The testator may, of course, authorize a private sale by the executor,⁷⁸ and such authorization may be either express or by implication;⁷⁹ but it has been said that in case of doubt the safe rule is to adhere to the mode of sale prescribed by law.⁸⁰ Similarly, the testator may specify that the sale be by public auction.⁸¹ A testamentary power to executors to sell real property at public or private sale has been

Request for public sale directory

A provision of a will requesting that a sale of land be by public auction does not prevent a private sale where the will also contains a provision authorizing the sale at private sale or public auction.—Industrial Trust Co. v. McLaughlin, 117 A. 428, 44 R.I. 850.

Private sale authorized

(1) Where wife bequeathed husband all her property during his life, with remainder to her children, and provided that husband as executor could, at any time he thought it best for the interest of her family, dispose of her property by replacing other property for their children, executor was authorized to sell at private sale.—Turner v. Baird, 125 S.E. 475, 159 Ga. 277.

(2) Will directing sale of land at widow's death "to best advantage" requires sale by negotiation with same care and judgment as in disposing of one's own property, unless public probate sale seems better under circumstances.—Rawlings v. Rawlings, 58 S.W.2d 735, 332 Mo. 503, reversing 45 S.W.2d 539, 226 Mo. App. 688, transferred, see, Sup., 39 S.W.2d 367.

(3) A testamentary power of sale to sell at the executor's discretion has been construed to permit a private sale.—Munson v. Cole, 98 Ind. 502.

(4) A power of sale for purposes of investment authorizes a private sale.—Christian Widows' & Orphans' Home v. Harber, Ky. App., 113 S.W. 818.

(5) An executrix, directed by the will of her deceased husband to sell his land as soon as it could be done without sacrifice, who sold it to her son at the highest price she had reason to think could be obtained therefor, without attempting to obtain other bids and without putting it on the market, exercised proper prudence in the management of the estate.—In re Branch, 100 S.W. 516, 123 Mo. App. 573.

Private sale not authorized

(1) Testamentary authority to the executor in the words, "I desire all my lands to be sold . . . upon such terms, as to notice or credit, as my executors may, in their sound discretion, deem best," does not authorize a private sale.—Jackson v. Williams, 50 Ga. 553.

(2) A will providing that personal property should be reduced to cash at public or private sale, and that the land and houses might be rented out or sold as the executrix might wish, did not give the right to make a private sale of the land.—Turner v. Peacock, 113 S.E. 585, 153 Ga. 870.

(3) Authority given an executrix by a will to sell lands without an order of the court does not dispense with the necessity for a public sale.—Turner v. Peacock, supra.

construed to permit a hybrid combination of public and private sale.⁸² Where the personal representative is given power of sale either at public or private sale if the devisees determine that a sale should be made, prior to the determination by the devisees they may call on the personal representative to elect whether the sale will be public or private, and, after such election, the mode elected cannot be changed without affording the devisees an opportunity to change their decision as to whether a sale shall be made.⁸³

While a probate court will entertain an application for advice and direction as to the place of a sale of real property under testamentary power, the power is sparingly exercised, and then only in exceptional cases.⁸⁴

Statutes with respect to appraisement, advertisement, notice, and the like are usually held applicable only to sales under judicial license, and not to those made under a power in the will;⁸⁵ but in the case of a public sale proper advertisement must be made.⁸⁶

Where ground rents are to be sold at public auction, the executor has no obligation, and would be unwise, to advertise his own estimate of the values thereof.⁸⁷ Notice has been held not essential to the validity of a sale under testamentary authority.⁸⁸

A general statute requiring a special bond for the sale of decedent's realty under order of court, see infra § 590, has been held not to apply to a sale by an executor under power in the will,⁸⁹ and a bond given voluntarily without a statute requiring it imposes no liability,⁹⁰ but in some jurisdictions under applicable statutes, an executor selling under testamentary power is required to give bond.⁹¹

Under some statutes the court may order the sale conducted on the premises.⁹²

§ 285. Terms and Conditions

Testamentary directions as to the terms and conditions of a sale of real property under power of sale must be complied with. As a general rule the sale should be for cash.

N.Y.—Pendleton v. Fay, 2 Paige 202.
Pa.—McCreery v. Hamlin, 7 Pa. 87.

Substantial compliance

Where testator specifies that the sale under testamentary power be public and the property is advertised for auction sale, the fact that the sale is to a purchaser bidding by letter does not render the sale not one at public auction, substantial compliance with the testamentary requirement being present.—Tyree v. Williams, 3 Bibb, Ky., 365, 6 Am.D. 663.

Effect of statute

An authorization by will of a public sale of testator's interest in farm was not authority, under the Fiduciaries Act, for executor to make a private sale, unless he was authorized by some court of competent jurisdiction empowered in the premises.—Bonebrake v. Koons, 5 A.2d 184, 333 Pa. 443.

Advisory order of sale

Where will authorized executors to convert estate into cash, sale of unadministered assets of testator's estate under order of court is not "judicial sale" so as to require public advertisement where order clearly indicated that sale was to be made by executor in his executorial capacity, and order was merely advisory.—Methodist Episcopal Church South of Louisa v. McAdams, 94 S.W.2d 11, 283 Ky. 833.

General power of sale

Where the powers conferred by a will included the power to settle, adjust, and compromise all debts owing by the testator, and to make settlement with his former partners and each of them, without authority from any court, and to sell and convey either at public or private sale any or all of the testator's real estate on such terms as to the executors should seem best, a sale made by them under such powers, without giving notice of the time, place, and terms of sale, and without including the value of the real estate in the bond given by them when they qualified, did not render the conveyance invalid.—Valentine v. Wyrso, 23 N.E. 1076, 123 Ind. 47, 7 L.R.A. 788.

In Utah, in view of Comp.L. 1888 § 4145, providing that a sale under testamentary power could be with or without notice, a will, conferring a naked power of sale without direction as to notice, authorized a sale without notice.—In re Walker's Estate, 23 P. 930, 6 Utah 369.

Sale of leased land to tenant

Where a will recited that testatrix has rented certain real estate for three years, and directed the executor, in case of her death before the expiration of the lease, to collect the rents, and to give the tenant three months' notice before the expiration of his term, and authorized the executor to sell such property, and in another clause testatrix expressed a wish that her estate might be settled as soon as convenient "after sale has been made of my said property," the executors were entitled to sell the land without terminating the tenant's possession, and hence a sale to the tenant without giving the three months' notice was proper.—*Hanbest v. Terms and conditions specified by the testator as limiting the power of sale must be complied with.⁹³ Furthermore, where the power of sale is specified as being to do that which the testator might do if he were living, the executor has no authority to sell at a price less than that agreed on by the testator under an executory contract of sale.⁹⁴ Where the personal representative makes private sales under special contracts, the terms of such contracts are binding.⁹⁵ A sale made during the term of a lease executed by the testator must be subject to the rights of the lessee.⁹⁶

A power of sale given to executors by will can only be exercised by a conveyance to an actual, bona fide money purchaser.⁹⁷ The executor must act for the best interest of the estate,⁹⁸ and he must realize the best price obtainable;⁹⁹ the fact that he occupies a fiduciary relation as to a purchaser¹ or that, prior to a better offer, he has contracted to sell the property,² cannot justify a violation of these duties. Furthermore, it has been said that it is not only the power, but the duty, of the court having supervisory control over the estate to see that a fair value is received.³

The general rule that a mere power of sale gives authority to sell for cash only, stated in the C.J.S. title Powers § 25, also 49 C.J. p 1273 note 55, applies to an executor's sale of realty under testamentary authority,⁴ although a provision for the sale of property to provide funds for a specific purpose has been construed to authorize a sale on such terms as the executor might deem reasonable.⁵ The safer and more prudent course when exercising a power is to sell for cash or its equivalent;⁶ but where the will gives the executor power to sell on credit, he may do so at his discretion,⁷ and sales with mort-

Where offer for property of estate was slightly less than another offer, executors had duty to determine which offer was most acceptable and for best interests of the estate after giving consideration to such factors as status of estate being administered, amount of cash on hand, sufficiency of personalty to pay debts, amount required to pay and satisfy general legacies, ability to find market at satisfactory price for various other pieces of realty comprising the estate, contingent liability of the estate on a bond accompanying mortgage or on a bond clause or covenant contained in the mortgage, and wisdom of conveying to a residuary legatee realty to apply on her legacy during administration of estate.—In re Griffin's Estate, 20 N.Y.S.2d 922.

Extent of power

Power to sell the realty on credit does not authorize the executor to contract for the purchaser's construction of a building on the property sold or for the financing of

gage security on the land itself for deferred payments are sometimes justified, in the exercise of good faith and reasonable prudence.⁸ Likewise, where the executor has discretionary power as to the sale and also power to make investments, he may sell realty in part for cash and in part for a lease with privilege of purchase.⁹

A testamentary power to an executor to sell coal underlying testator's lands "with the usual mining privileges" does not authorize a sale of the coal with a waiver and release of the right to surface and lateral support.¹⁰

§ 286. Confirmation

A sale of real property under testamentary power ordinarily need not be confirmed by a court, but confirmation is sometimes required by statute. An order of confirmation may be revoked or corrected, and is subject to review.

It is sometimes required by statute that a sale of realty under testamentary authority shall be confirmed or ratified by a court,¹¹ but in the absence of such a requirement confirmation by a court is not necessary,¹² particularly where the executor's power of sale is expressly that of testator,¹³ unless necessary to protect wards of the court.¹⁴ However, even though the testator confers power of sale to be exercised without the permission, aid, or intervention of any court, where the power is inadvertently exercised prior to administration proceedings, the court may entertain a petition for ratification by the such construction.—Spoolan Realty Corporation v. Haebler, 262 N.Y.S. 197, 147 Misc. 9.

Variance from testamentary direction

Executors, authorized by will to sell property and take in payment notes bearing interest at four and one half per cent per annum, could take notes with interest payable semiannually, the determination of such small detail being within their power and in accordance with usual business customs.—In re Juillard's Estate, 191 N.Y.S. 904, 117 Misc. 642.

Installment payment

A will authorizing the executrix to manage the estate as she should deem best, and to sell any portion or the whole thereof, and to invest the proceeds as she should deem fit, has been held to empower the executrix to convey real property to a trustee, who was to hold for a syndicate which was to plat the same, under the terms of which sale the purchase price secured by a lien on the property was made payable in installments.—Goodell v. Sanford, 77 P. 522, 31 Mont. 163.

(1) Where the will fails to designate the person to execute the power of sale, in view of Act Feb. 24, 1854 § 12, providing that in such case the power shall be exercised under the control and direction of the orphans' court, a sale by an executor without order of court may be confirmed by such court.—Appeal of Musselman, 65 Pa. 480.

(2) So the orphans' court may confirm the sale under the act of April 13, 1854, P.L. p 368, providing that, in all cases wherein any of the courts might have authorized any sale or conveyance, such a sale or conveyance made without order of court may be ratified and confirmed.—*Donnelly v. In Texas confirmation is necessary only when the sale needed to be authorized by the court.—Smith v. Swan, 22 S.W. 247, 2 Tex.Civ.App. 563, error refused.

Character of sale not affected by statutory requirement of confirmation

A sale by an executor under a power in the will is not a judicial sale, nor does the statutory requirement that no title shall pass until the sale is confirmed give to it the incidents of a judicial sale. The purchaser deals with the executor in making the purchase as he would with any other vendor, and his rights and liabilities are governed by the rules applicable to such sales generally. The sale is treated as if made under the power; and the purchaser is required to examine the sufficiency of this power, as he is that of any other power under which a sale may be made.—In re Backesto's Estate, 218 P. 597, 63 Cal.App. 265—24 C.J. p 172 note 2 [a].

executor at the instance of the purchaser.¹⁵ A purchaser under a contract expressly providing that it is subject to the approval of the court is estopped by contract from denying the right of the court to confirm or disaffirm the contract.¹⁶ Where an executor had authority to sell land for the benefit of certain persons, and purporting to act under the power he did so, but failed to make any return so that there was no confirmation, the beneficiaries having so ratified the sale as to estop them from disputing it, it was held that the court having jurisdiction of the probate proceedings might, because of the estoppel, confirm the sale and direct execution of the conveyance on a compliance with the terms of the contract by the purchaser.¹⁷

Under statutory provisions, when a proper memorandum of the sale is made, the executors have exercised the power conferred on them by the will, and the sale, in the absence of fraud or irregularity, is binding on the estate, subject to confirmation; and the court must confirm it unless the price bid is disproportionate to the value of the property, and it is made to appear that an increased bid of ten per cent can be obtained.¹⁸

Objections not sufficient to prevent confirmation. As a sale by an executor passes only such interest as the testator had in the property, as stated infra § 293, it is not a ground of objection to a confirmation of the sale that another person has an interest in the property, nor, when it is within the discretion of the executor whether he will make a sale under the power, that the sale is not for the best interest of the estate or of some particular heir,¹⁹ that the purchaser, as the executor's agent, puffed the price by overbidding, the higher price being beneficial to the objectors, or that the price is inadequate, unless so grossly inadequate as to indicate a lack of reasonable judgment and discretion in the executor, or fraud, misconduct, or mistake.²⁰

Nature of proceeding. Where an executor makes a report of the sale of real property under testamentary power of sale, and an objection thereto is filed by interested parties, to which the executor files his answer, the proceeding for confirmation is termed a plenary proceeding.²¹

Jurisdiction. A probate court has been held to have jurisdiction as to a plenary proceeding to obtain confirmation of the executor's sale.²² However, it has been held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to confirm a sale by executors under testamentary power.²³

Parties. Under a will giving an executor power to convey land by deed or otherwise at private sale, it has been held that the devisees are not necessary parties to a proceeding for a decree sanctioning the sale.²⁴

Pleadings. While pleadings in the strict sense do not exist in a plenary confirmation proceeding, the report of the executor, objections by interested parties, and the executor's answer correspond to a bill or petition and answer.²⁵

Notice of hearing. It has been held that where the sale was made at public auction, the judge must make an order fixing a day for hearing the report, and the clerk must give notice thereof.²⁶

Evidence. Objections to confirmation of the sale will be sustained where the executor fails to establish by a clear preponderance of evidence that the sale was fair, in good faith, and for an adequate price.²⁷

Framing issues. In the case of a plenary proceeding for confirmation of the executor's report, the parties objecting to confirmation may petition the court to frame issues on the facts in controversy, to be determined by another court.²⁸ Such petition has the effect of waiving the irregularity that the executor's answer is not under oath.²⁹ Issues which may be framed include whether ground rents sold by the executor at public sales were adequately advertised, whether the sales were properly conducted, whether the purchaser was acting as an agent of the executor, whether the prices were fair and adequate, whether the sales were to the highest bidders, and the nature of the property or interest sold.³⁰ The rule that to warrant submission of issues the pleadings must contain allegations which afford a sufficient basis to disclose the affirmation and denial of a material and relevant fact, see Courts § 308 a (2), applies to a plenary proceeding for confirmation of an executor's sale of realty.³¹ On the other hand, where the allegations of the pleadings present a question, the issue as to such question should be framed.³² It is improper to frame an immaterial issue,³³ or one infringing on the province of the court.³⁴

Matters considered. In determining whether confirmation of the sale should be refused because of inadequacy of price, the court should consider not only the price, but also the other circumstances which in any proximate way relate to the fairness and propriety of the sale at the time it was made.³⁵ So it has been held that in considering whether a statutory approval or disapproval of a sale of real property under a testamentary power not naming who shall execute it should be ordered, adequacy of price is not the sole element to be considered.³⁶

Judgment or decree. In the case of a plenary confirmation proceeding, the probate court may render a judgment or decree either on the report, objections, and answer, or, if a petition for framing issues has been filed, on the findings in such proceeding.³⁷ Where the contingency for the exercise of the power of sale exists, and a sale has been made at a fair and reasonable price, it will be confirmed.³⁸ Where a residuary legatee sought by petition to have the executors account for the rents and profits of real estate which they had sold to a third person, and the executors answered, and the court after settling their account entered a judgment by which their deeds conveying the real estate were adjudged valid, the judgment was not a confirmation of the sale.³⁹

Revocation or correction of ratification. Where the order of ratification of a sale, made and reported by executors under authority conferred by the will, has been procured by an honest mistake, the orphans' court has the power of revocation and correction, provided the application is made within a reasonable time.⁴⁰ Likewise, where a sale at public auction is confirmed, but no order fixing the day for hearing and no notice of hearing appears, the court, on its own motion, may set aside the confirmation.⁴¹

Review of confirmation. An order confirming an executor's sale of realty is ordinarily subject to review.⁴² However, where, on an application for the confirmation of an executor's sale of real estate, the purchaser filed objections on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and on such objections being overruled the court took testimony on the merits without any answer or other opposition being filed by such purchaser, and refused to confirm the sale, the purchaser is not entitled to a review of such refusal on appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial.⁴³ On appeal from such an order, it is the duty of appellant to furnish the return of sale.⁴⁴

§ 287. Who May Purchase

A sale of real property under testamentary power of sale as a general rule may be to any person, but sales to the representative's agent, partner, firm, or attorney are usually not upheld.

44. Cal.—In re Robinson, 75 P. 777, 142 Cal. 152.

As a general rule, where an executor is authorized to sell he may sell to any person.⁴⁵

However, a sale by a personal representative to his agent or partner or to a firm of which he is a member cannot be upheld against the objection of the heirs or devisees,⁴⁶ especially where there has been bad faith in the transaction.⁴⁷

Likewise, a sale by an executor or administrator to his own attorney is improper for the reason that the sale may be supposed to be made under the influence, if not the pressure, of legal advice and induced by confidential relations which ought to be above suspicion.⁴⁸ This is especially true where the representative is illiterate and incompetent for the trust,⁴⁹ and in such case the attorney may at the option of the parties in interest be charged as trustee of the property purchased and required to account therefor,⁵⁰ without any evidence that the sale was in fact unfair or the price inadequate.⁵¹

§ 288. — Executor or Administrator

Subject to numerous limitations, the personal representative cannot purchase at his own sale under testamentary power to sell real property. In the absence of fraud, such purchase is merely voidable.

As an application of the general rule, stated in the C.J.S. title Trusts § 302, also 65 C.J. p 768 note 8, that a trustee cannot purchase from himself or at his own sale,⁵² it is well established as a general rule that an executor or administrator cannot become the purchaser at his own sale of the property of his decedent,⁵³ but there are early cases to the contrary.⁵⁴ The rule precludes the representative not only from purchasing outright, but also from being interested in any purchase at a sale by him;⁵⁵ neither is it confined in its application to a direct purchase, but an indirect purchase by means of an agent or a third person who is the ostensible purchaser but who really acts for the representative in order to enable him to acquire title may also be avoided.⁵⁶

Limitations of rule. Express authority in the will may, of course, warrant a purchase by the executor.⁵⁷ So the rule that an executor cannot purchase at his own sale does not apply to a purchase,

Purchaser child of testator

Where the wife of the testator, as executrix, decided to sell lands for payment of debts pursuant to authority given, the sale is not invalid where the transaction was bona fide, and there were unpaid debts, because it was to one of the sons of the testator.—Simpson v. Simpson's Ex'x, 225 S.W. 495, 189 Ky. 536.

Reason for rule

(1) The rule is founded on the unfairness that is likely to follow on a sale in which the same person is both vendor and purchaser.—Johnson v. Erickson, 194 N.W. 670, 110 Neb. 511.

(2) Thus it is said that to permit an executor to purchase the property from himself would allow him to create in himself an interest opposite to that of the party or parties for whom he acts, and at the same time a conflict between the self-interest and integrity of the fiduciary, thereby furnishing both motive and opportunity for his profiting from his relations to the property, at the expense of those it is his duty to protect.—Naylor v. Thomas, 228 S.W. 9, 190 Ky. 588.

Purchase for estate

Executor, with power of sale and conversion of real estate, cannot purchase outstanding interest in land with funds of estate.—Fidelity Union Trust Co. v. J. R. Shanley Estate Co., 167 A. 865, 113 N.J.Eq. 562.

Sale to pay debts

Where an executor is directed in the will to pay debts, and has sufficient funds to do so, he cannot make a sale to himself.—Belt v. Adams, 86 So. 584, 124 Miss. 194, suggestion of error overruled 87 So. 666, 125 Miss. 387.

Election of executor conclusive

Judgment of deceased partner's ex-

under an option in a lease executed by the testator, by a corporation lessee in which the executor is a stockholder.⁵⁸ The executor may obtain leave of court to purchase at his own sale, in which case a purchase by him will give him good title.⁵⁹ It has also been asserted that where the representative has a personal interest in the property he may become the purchaser,⁶⁰ and a purchase by the representative has also been upheld where the sale was a fair one and a fair price was given for the property.⁶¹ It is within the discretion of the executor at a public sale to bid up the property, in his representative capacity, to the price at which he desires to sell.⁶² Where a mortgagee was appointed administrator of the estate of the mortgagor, but did not take possession of the mortgaged premises or take any steps to have them sold for the payment of debts, but foreclosed his mortgage while he was acting as administrator, he had the right to become the purchaser at the foreclosure sale.⁶³ A person who was nominated as an executor in the will, but has not qualified or acted as such, may purchase the property of the testator at a sale made by the executor or executors who did qualify,⁶⁴ or a representative who has resigned or been discharged may become a purchaser at a sale subsequently made by the personal representatives remaining in office, or by his successor.⁶⁵ The rule forbidding a purchase by an executor by means of an agent does not apply where the purchase is made for purposes of power of investment for benefit of the beneficiaries.⁶⁶ A representative who has sold real property of his decedent may purchase the same for himself from the purchaser at his sale, provided the first sale was real and bona fide and not a mere sham or pretense to enable the representative to acquire title.⁶⁷

Whether sale void or voidable. A purchase by an executor or administrator at his own sale is usually held to be not void but merely voidable at the option of those interested;⁶⁸ but where the transaction is tainted with actual fraud, it is void.⁶⁹ So, also, where the executors had no power to sell, but under the mistaken belief that they had, sold the real estate, and became the purchasers of a portion of it, it has been held that the sale was void, and ecutors, authorized by will to sell testator's interest to his son, also an executor, at such price as they deemed just to other heirs, is conclusive.—In re Wallace's Estate, 149 A. 473, 299 Pa. 333.

Even though a statute, prohibiting an executor from bidding at the sale of his decedent's real estate without obtaining leave of court, applies only to sales for payment of decedent's debts, the executor should obtain leave of court in order to purchase at his own sale regardless of the purpose of the sale.—In re Apple's Estate, 31 Pa. Interest as trustee

(1) Where will provides that executor should invest one third of estate and pay income thereof to testatrix' daughter and the corpus thereof to daughter's children on death of daughter, interest of executor as trustee in sale of ground rents belonging to estate is not in conflict with the other beneficiaries of the will, but is in common with them, since executor is entitled to an undivided one third of the estate in common until distribution with the other beneficiaries.—Harlan v. Lee, supra.

(2) The executor as trustee is entitled to an opportunity to acquire in severally any portion of the estate for the use and benefit of the trust.—Harlan v. Lee, supra.

Sale by purchaser

(1) Where realty belonging to decedent was conveyed by the executor and executrix to a third person and the next day reconveyed by such person and his wife to the executrix individually, it was a single transaction, and the deed was voidable, under the rule that a conveyance by an executor of land belonging to the estate, made to himself directly or indirectly, is voidable.—Le Page v. Goldstein, 201 N.Y.S. 158, 121 Misc. 233.

(2) Executor's sale of trust property at one half its advertised value and conveyance thereof by purchaser to executor's wife was voidable at option of cestui que trust.—Grist v. Carswell, 165 So. 102, 231 Ala. 442.

Sale to agent

A sale by executor to purchaser as agent of executor in his private capacity is not denounced by the law as fraudulent in fact and is not absolutely void, but is merely voidable on objection by a party in interest.—Harlan v. Lee, 199 A. 862, 174 Md. 579.

could not be enforced against them.⁷⁰

A sale to a near relative of the representative is improper and voidable,⁷¹ especially if the representative has unduly favored such purchaser.⁷² However, where the sale is fair and bona fide and for adequate consideration, the sale will be upheld.⁷³

Ratification. A purchase by an executor or administrator at his own sale may be ratified by the persons interested.⁷⁴ An acquiescence in the sale by the heirs for a long time will create a presumption of ratification,⁷⁵ and an heir or legatee who receives the proceeds with knowledge of the facts thereby ratifies the sale or becomes estopped subsequently to attack it.⁷⁶

§ 289. Conveyance

The power given by will to an executor to sell realty includes the power to convey, and a conveyance may be valid although it does not expressly refer to the power.

A will giving the executor power to sell realty carries by necessary implication the power to convey,⁷⁷ which authority, it is held, may be delegated.⁷⁸

Form and contents. It is not necessary that the conveyance should set out the existence of circumstances warranting the sale⁷⁹ or show that the sale was made in the manner authorized,⁸⁰ nor is a deed invalid because of the omission of the word "grant" therefrom, where the words "remise, release and forever quit claim" are used.⁸¹

The conveyance must be executed in the name of the executor,⁸² but the fact that the conveyance is not executed by the executor in his representative capacity will not invalidate it as a proper exercise of the power of sale where it clearly appears from the instrument that he is acting in such capacity.⁸³ Where one who is executor and trustee under a will has power to sell as executor, a deed signed by him as executor only and not as trustee is sufficient.⁸⁴

Recital of power. Although it is the better practice for a conveyance by an executor pursuant to a power to include a recital of such power,⁸⁵ such a recital is not necessary to the validity of the conveyance,⁸⁶ provided the instrument shows that the grantor had in view the subject of the power.⁸⁷ An intention to exercise the power of sale sufficiently appears where there is some reference to the power in the conveyance,⁸⁸ where there is a reference to the subject matter on which the power is to operate,⁸⁹ or where the conveyance would have no operation and would be insensible and absurd if it were not intended as an exercise of the power.⁹⁰ Thus the deed of an executor who had no estate whatever in the land, but only a power to sell, will be considered an exercise of that power.⁹¹ Where in addition to his power to sell, the executor had an individual interest in the property, whether the deed is an exercise of the power or only a grant of his interest depends on his intent as indicated by the face of the instrument and the circumstances under which it was executed and delivered.⁹² In such case, a conveyance made without actual reference to the power has been presumed a deed of his individual interest alone,⁹³ unless it is executed by him as the representative of the estate.⁹⁴

Warranties or covenants. A power of sale given by the will ordinarily does not authorize an executor to bind the estate by covenants in the deed, including covenants of warranty.⁹⁵ Unless the executor specially agrees to give a deed with covenants, he is under no obligation to do so.⁹⁶ Moreover, if he gives a deed with covenants, they operate, if at all, only as a personal obligation,⁹⁷ although they do not have this effect if the terms of the covenant indicate that he did not intend to bind himself personally.⁹⁸

However, a covenant by an executor, conveying one of two lots, restricting the use to which the retained lot might be put, while not effective to impose liability on the estate as a covenant, may be effective as a grant of an easement.⁹⁹ It has also been held that, where on a sale of real estate under a power in the will the executors stipulated that all taxes, assessments, etc., would be allowed out of the purchase money and the property conveyed free from all encumbrances, and several years afterward an unpaid assessment which was a lien on the property was discovered, the purchaser might recover the amount of such assessment from the executors as such.¹

Seal. A deed by an executor, not under seal and in execution of a power, will be upheld as a contract to convey; and where testator's heirs have received a substantial part of the estate, they cannot defeat the deed because of the absence of the seal.²

Construction and effect. In matters of description the usual rules of construction as applied to conveyances apply to a deed of land from an executor or administrator.³ A covenant by the representative against his own acts does not by implication warrant the title or amount to a covenant that his decedent was seized of the premises.⁴ The mere form of a conveyance by an executor under a power in the will may be disregarded and the effect of the conveyance determined by the power.⁵

Presumption of authority. Where the grantor in a conveyance styles himself the executor and possession accompanies the deed, it will be presumed after the lapse of many years that the grantor had authority to make the deed.⁶

A conveyance before the probate of the will has been held good where the will was afterward probated.⁷

§ 290. Payment and Recovery of Purchase Money

a. In general

b. Actions to recover purchase money

a. In General

Executors who sell land under a power granted in the will are authorized to collect the purchase money and on default by the purchaser they may, among other things, resell the property.

Where real property is sold by executors under a power in the will, the executors are authorized to collect and receive the purchase money and enforce any security given for deferred payments,¹⁰ and they do not lose their power as such to receive the money, nor is the purchaser relieved of his duty to pay to them because an unsuccessful effort has been made to secure the payment of the principal sum to the persons ultimately entitled to receive it from the executors.¹¹ Where the executors have sold realty, it must be presumed that the money paid therefor is in their hands waiting distribution or that the persons entitled thereto have received it.¹²

Resale and recovery of difference in price. Where the purchaser refuses to complete his purchase, the executor usually has a remedy by making a resale and proceeding against the purchaser for the difference in price,¹³ but this remedy is not exclusive and does not preclude an action for the purchase money.¹⁴

b. Actions to Recover Purchase Money

An executor who has sold realty pursuant to a power contained in the will has a right, on the purchaser's default, to sue for the purchase money.

An executor who has sold realty pursuant to a power contained in the will has the right to sue for the purchase money and coerce payment as an incident to his right to receive the same,¹⁵ but where he had no legal right to sell, he cannot maintain an action for the purchase money.¹⁶

Enforcement of vendor's lien. Under a statute authorizing a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another to sue thereon, administrators to whom a note for the purchase money of land sold by the estate is made payable can maintain an action to enforce a vendor's lien thereon, although the conveyance was made by the heirs.¹⁷

Defenses. Fraud in the sale has been held a good defense to an action by the executor for the purchase money.¹⁸ Where the property was sold without any contract as to encumbrances, and conveyed by deed without covenants, the fact that taxes were a lien thereon at the time of the sale, and were paid by the purchaser to remove the encumbrance thereof, constitutes no defense to an action for the price.¹⁹ Where executors offer real property of their testatrix for sale pursuant to the terms of the will, and a contract for the sale thereof is entered into with a person having no knowledge of the existence of a restrictive agreement, signed by the testatrix, with other property owners, thereby imposing a servitude on the land, the purchaser cannot be compelled specifically to perform the contract.²⁰

Counterclaims and credits. In an action on a note given to an executor for the purchase price of property sold by the executor to defendant, an answer that the testator was indebted to defendant in a sum named is not good as a counterclaim,²¹ nor can a note for a certain amount executed by one of defendants to the mother of one of the minor legatees, which was not agreed to by the executor and which has never been paid, be allowed as a credit.²²

Restoration of status quo. Where the purchaser defends on the ground that the executor was without power to sell, the purchaser must offer to restore what he has received,²³ and this involves a duty to account for the profits realized during his possession of the property.²⁴ Similarly, where an executor's deed was defective, as purporting to convey his own interest only in the property, he having no legal interest in it, but only a naked power to sell, still the purchaser acquired an equitable estate by the deed which he must reconvey or offer to reconvey, before he can make any defense to the payment of notes given for the purchase money.²⁵

However, it has been held that where the sale itself was invalid, the purchaser is not bound to offer to surrender possession to entitle him to resist the collection of the purchase money.²⁶

Estoppel. A purchaser of real estate from executors and trustees, on sale without order of court, after ratification by the orphans' court, when all persons interested appeared, and the fund from the sale has been distributed and a dividend paid creditors, is not entitled to question the validity of the sale in an action on a bond for the price.²⁷ Beneficiary purchasers under a trust agreement, who assented thereto for years, entered into possession, sold portions of the property, made payments on the price, and in all respects ratified the transaction between the purchasing syndicate, of which they were members, and the vendor, until sued for the balance of the price, are estopped from claiming that they received no title to the property, or that the sale, which was one by an executrix under a power, was irregularly made.²⁸

§ 291. Proceeds

Where realty is sold by an executor pursuant to a power contained in the will, the proceeds should be distributed as the will directs. Such proceeds are subject to the claims of the creditors of the estate, even though the power was not granted for the purpose of paying debts.

Where realty is sold by an executor under a power contained in the will, the beneficiaries of the will ordinarily take the same interest in the proceeds of the sale as they had in the land.²⁹ Where a power is lawfully exercised for certain specified purposes,

Dower

Testator's widow acquired vested right to money representing value of her dower estate in testator's land when widow as executrix released dower and sold land under testamentary power of sale without having brought action for admeasurement of dower.—In re Stevens' Will, 277 N.Y.S. 459, 154 Misc. 415.

Profit realized on sale

Under New York law, title to farm devised to testatrix' children with a power of sale conferred on executors passed to children on testatrix' death, and executors had a mere power of sale, on exercise of which title passed from children to purchaser, and children took an equivalent estate in proceeds, and hence profit realized on sale belonged to children and was taxable to them to the exclusion of the estate.—Weber v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, C.C. A., 111 F.2d 766.

Premature sale

Where an executor, having power to sell certain land on the death of testator's widow and divide the proceeds among testator's heirs, sold the same during the widow's life, his void deed did not convert the equitable interest of the legatees in the property, so as to compel them to interplead with the widow's representatives as to their contesting claims on the purchase money paid for such deed.—Pratt v. Worrell, 57 A. 450, 66 N.J.Eq. 194.

Deeds executed by beneficiaries

Where a power of sale of land was never exercised by executors, but wherever sales were made deeds were executed by all the heirs, including the executors, and the moneys were received by one of them as representative and agent of the heirs, all persons interested elected to take the

it is the duty of the executor to devote the proceeds to such purposes, and to pay over the surplus to such persons as the testator intended,³⁰ and if the executor misapplies the proceeds, he is personally liable to the creditors and beneficiaries of the estate.³¹

Duty to account. An executor will be compelled to account in the probate court for the proceeds of real estate sold by him pursuant to the directions of the will,³² and in a proper case an executor into whose hands proceeds of the sale of realty have come, or are to come, may be required to give security therefor;³³ but where a sale is made by the representative without authority, he cannot be compelled to account in his representative capacity for the proceeds.³⁴ Where the executor sells lands under a power conferred by the will on him personally, and not as executor, he should not include the proceeds of sale in his executor's account,³⁵ nor should proceeds received as trustee and not as executor be brought into the administration account.³⁶ Where executors, having no power as such to sell land, sell the testator's land as agents for the devisees, they cannot be required to account as executors for the proceeds of such sales.³⁷

Liability for debts. Where the testator has authorized or directed a sale of land for the payment of debts, the money arising therefrom becomes legal assets for that purpose.³⁸ Moreover, since a testator cannot, by any power of sale in his will, relieve his land from liability for his debts in case the personalty is insufficient to pay them,³⁹ it is generally held that the proceeds of a sale under a power may, if necessary, be used to pay debts, even though the power was not granted for that purpose.⁴⁰ An executor who has paid out in satisfaction of decedent's debts a sum in excess of the personalty may reimburse himself from the proceeds of a sale of the realty.⁴¹

It has been held, however, that, where real estate was not converted into personalty by the terms of a will until sale thereof more than two years from the date of testator's death, the proceeds were discharged from liability for decedent's debts.⁴² Where proceeds of the property.—New England Trust Co. v. Morse, 136 N.E. 885, 243 Mass. 39.

Partition during testator's lifetime

Where a mother partitioned a farm between two of her sons, between whom she subsequently divided her estate by will, the fact that one son by judicious management of his share of the farm increased its value, so that it sold subsequently for a much higher price than was brought by the other son's half of the farm when sold to pay debts, was no basis for judgment that the second son, executor of the will and trustee thereunder with his brother, should divide the profits of his own management with his brother and the latter's daughters.—*Buckner v. Pledge of purchase-money notes obtained on sale

Under will devising property in trust and authorizing trustee, if necessary, to sell land to complete education of grandchildren, trustee was authorized to sell land and to take back purchase-money notes and to pledge such notes to secure money to be used for education of such grandchildren.—Lewis v. Keating, 86 S.W.2d 417, 191 Ark. 422.

Distribution prior to sale

Where the will directs the realty to be sold and a specified amount of the proceeds to be distributed in a certain manner, and the realty exceeds such amount in value, but owing to prevailing conditions it would be difficult to obtain an adequate price for the realty, the court, prior to a sale, may order the distribution of such amount from cash on hand.—*Parker v. testator divided his whole estate into two parts, called "personal fund" and "real estate," and it was plainly his intention that the real estate should bear the expense of the conversion thereof into money, equity will charge such expense to the proceeds of such real estate, although there is a general provision in the will for the payment of all debts from the personal fund.⁴³ While money received from the sale of mortgaged land belonging to an insolvent estate cannot be taken to pay the cost of a settlement suit in which a mortgage lien is enforced, so as to leave an amount insufficient to satisfy the mortgage, if personal property is used in paying insurance, taxes, repairs, and interest on the mortgaged property to an extent exceeding what is taken to pay costs of settlement, including attorney's fee, commissioner's fee, and advertising, the mortgagee cannot complain, especially where he would have been required to pay a large part of such expenses out of the proceeds in case of foreclosure.⁴⁴

In an action to sell certain real estate of decedent and to make distribution of the proceeds arising from the sale, moneys received by the executor from a sale of property under a power of sale in the will cannot be directed to be applied to the payment of the debts of the estate.⁴⁵

Creditor of devisee. Where, after recovery of a judgment against devisees, but before execution sale thereunder the executors exercise their power of sale, the execution purchaser is not entitled to follow the fund in the executor's hands.⁴⁶ Where the proceeds are directed to be divided among testator's children, the administrator is entitled to receive the money in preference to a judgment creditor of one of the children.⁴⁷

Sale of another's land. Where an executor by mistake or otherwise has sold land not belonging to his testator the true owner is entitled to the purchase money.⁴⁸

Liability of purchaser as to application of proceeds. The general rule is that, where a purchaser from an executor who sells under a power contained in the will pays over the purchase money in good faith to his vendor, he is under no duty or obligation to see to the proper application or distribution of the money by the vendor;⁴⁹ and the validity of the deed of the executor is not impaired by his using the money for a purpose other than that contemplated by the will.⁵⁰ The rule is the same even though the sale is for payment of legacies.⁵¹ It has been held, however, that if the debts are specific or scheduled, it becomes the duty of the purchaser to see that the purchase money is applied in satisfaction thereof.⁵²

Proceedings for distribution. Equity formerly took exclusive jurisdiction over the proceeds of a sale of real estate under a will as to compelling distribution,⁵³ but probate courts may be vested by statute with authority over such matters.⁵⁴

§ 292. Nature, Validity, and Effect of Sale

A sale by an executor pursuant to a power granted in the will is not a judicial sale.

A sale by an executor acting under the authority of a power conferred by the will is in no sense judicial in its character.⁵⁵ The purchaser deals with the executor as he would with any other vendor,⁵⁶ and the relationship is attended with the same incidents and governed by the same rules as apply to vendor and purchaser generally.⁵⁷ Thus the purchaser is not required to accept an encumbered title.⁵⁸

A sale can derive no aid from a power given by the will unless made under the power.⁵⁹ Where the will contains a power of sale, but gives no power to mortgage the realty, a conveyance made for the purpose of indirectly subjecting the property to a mortgage is invalid.⁶⁰ Where a power of sale is given to an executor, on the happening of a contingency which can only be ascertained by the exercise of judgment and discretion, and the executor in the honest exercise of his judgment determines that such contingency has happened and makes the sale, the sale cannot be invalidated even though it subsequently appears that the executor was mistaken.⁶¹ A sale by an executor pursuant to direction in the will is not invalid because of the invalidity of the testamentary directions as to the disposition of the proceeds.⁶² An executor will not be compelled by a decree of the orphans' court to execute a deed for real estate of the testator sold by him, where it appears that some of the devisees agreed with the other devisees that the property should not be struck off below a certain price, and that the crier disregarded this understanding, and sold the property at a lower price to some of the parties to the agreement.⁶³

It is not necessary to the validity of an executor's sale under a power in the will to pay the mortgages and legacies that all the facts appear of record.⁶⁴

Estoppel. An estoppel to complain of a sale results from the action of heirs or devisees in joining the executor in a conveyance of the land.⁶⁵ Where executors sold real estate under a power in the will, and under a decree settling their accounts the cash received by such sale appeared, it did not estop one interested in the estate, having notice of such accounting, from contesting the validity of the sale, where the account did not set out the facts rendering the sale invalid, and no issue as to its validity was tendered.⁶⁶

Void agreement for sale. An agreement by an executor, for himself and the other executors, to sell certain land of the estate, when the executors perfected title to the property, has been held to be void, as contrary to public policy.⁶⁷ Where a conveyance was made and deed executed by executors after the will had been probated, and they were qualified and empowered to convey, it was immaterial that, before their appointment, they had made an unauthorized or void agreement to sell to the same grantee.⁶⁸

Oath of office. The validity of an executor's deed cannot be questioned collaterally on the ground that the executor failed to file the statutory oath of office.⁶⁹

A sale of realty under a proper exercise of the power granted by the will conveys all the title that the testator had, free of the claims of heirs, devisees, and creditors.

After a will is admitted to probate it is the law for the administration of the testator's estate, and a sale or conveyance of realty under a proper exercise of a power conferred thereby transfers all the title that the testator had,⁷⁰ and frees the land from any claim by the heirs or devisees,⁷¹ or general cred-

Liens created by devisees

(1) The execution of power of sale of land by an executor in course of administration and settlement of the estate which created power divests title of devisee or legatee, regardless of lien of a third party on the interest of the devisee.

itors,⁷² and discharges the land from the lien of debts not of record,⁷³ or even of a judgment rendered against decedent in his lifetime.⁷⁴ However, where a sale is made with the collusion of the purchaser for the purpose of preventing the payment of the debts, the land will remain charged with the debts in the hands of the purchaser.⁷⁵

A purchaser in good faith from an executor who has power to sell gets a title and possession which is good at law, even though the sale is prematurely or indiscreetly made, or the necessity for the exercise of the power has not arisen, or the sale was made for an inadequate consideration, or in violation of the executor's duty, the relief against him, if any can be had, being only in equity and at the instance of the beneficiary whose interests have been prejudiced.⁷⁶ However, a sale of land by executors without consideration or outside the scope of the power given them by the will is void as to the immediate grantee and subsequent grantees with notice, at the suit of the estate of the testator and his creditors, or at the suit of prior judgment creditors of the beneficiaries in such estate.⁷⁷

Relation back. Where the executor is authorized to sell but is not given title, the title of a purchaser from the executor relates back to the testator's death.⁷⁸

Rule of caveat emptor. A sale by an executor passes only such interest as testator had in the property,⁷⁹ and a purchaser whose deed contains no covenants to cover defects in title takes at his own risk, and unless he can show fraudulent representations on which he relied as an inducement to his purchase, he is without remedy in case the title proves defective or he otherwise gets less than he expected to secure by his purchase;⁸⁰ but where the executor assures one about to purchase that he will make him a clear title and the purchase is made accordingly the purchaser is entitled to a title free from encumbrance,⁸¹ and it has also been held that in case of a mistake, where the proceeds of the sale are still within the control of the court, relief may be granted to a purchaser.⁸²

Protection as bona fide purchaser. Where one purchases land from an executor as such, he is bound to know whether or not the executor is authorized by the will to make the sale,⁸³ and if the executor has no such power the purchaser is not an innocent or bona fide purchaser.⁸⁴ However, where the executor has power to sell, a purchaser from him acquires good title notwithstanding the bad faith of the executor in making the sale, where he had no knowledge of such bad faith,⁸⁵ for the purchaser has a right to presume that the executor is acting in good faith,⁸⁶ and is not bound to inquire whether a necessity for the exercise of the power given by the will exists.⁸⁷

(2) A residuary legatee's judgment creditor could not claim that power of sale of realty granted in will merged in title of the legatee and was void, where judgment creditor ignored fact that unpaid debts of estate warranted a sale of the realty under power of sale granted in will.—Bachelder v. Sycher, 25 N.Y.S.2d 467, 175 Misc. 845.

Conveyance by beneficiaries

Sale of land under the directions of a will passes a good title, although the persons entitled to the proceeds of the sale have previously conveyed their interests in the land, as such interests are personal and have no connection with the title. N.J.—Vanderveer v. Conover, 40 N.J. Eq. 161.

N.C.—Orrender v. Call, 7 S.E. 878, 101 N.C. 399.

Child not provided for in will

Under a statute excepting out of a will the interest of any child or children not named or provided for, a sale by an executor under a power in the will, while it transfers to the purchaser all that the executor could lawfully sell, does not affect the interest of such child or children.—*Northrop v. A purchaser with notice of a defect in the executor's power to sell is not a bona fide purchaser;⁸⁸ and if he has notice that the sale is made for a purpose other than that for which the will empowers the executor to sell, or is otherwise unauthorized, the legal title of the devisees is not divested.⁸⁹ The purchaser cannot safely disregard information which he cannot avoid receiving without extraordinary negligence.⁹⁰ However, it has been held that where an executor sells land, in excess of the power conferred by the will, to pay debts of the testator, the purchaser is subrogated to the rights of creditors, and can hold possession of the land as security for so much of the money as was paid on the debts.⁹¹

Where the sale is tainted with fraud and covin between the executor and the purchaser, it is absolutely void and the title to the property remains unchanged.⁹²

Representative as bona fide purchaser. Even though a purchase by a representative at a sale by himself or by his corepresentatives pursuant to a power in the will is not set aside, still he is not a bona fide purchaser and is not entitled to protection as such.⁹³

Purchaser from representative. Although a purchase by a representative at his own sale is voidable, see supra § 288, a deed from him conveying the property to a bona fide purchaser who pays a valuable consideration will pass title,⁹⁴ and after there has been such a conveyance by the representative, the original purchase by him will not be set aside.⁹⁵ However, a purchaser with notice takes only such rights as the representative acquired by his pur-

§ 294. Setting Aside Sale

- a. In general
- b. Persons entitled to attack sale
- c. Proceedings

a. In General

In a proper case a sale of realty by the executor under a power conferred by the will may be set aside.

A sale of real estate by the executor under power conferred by a will which is imperfectly executed will be set aside.⁹⁷ A sale may be set aside because it was not adequately advertised and unfairness in the sale resulted from the fact,⁹⁸ or where the representative or his close relative was the purchaser.⁹⁹ Where a will authorized the executor to sell so much of the real estate as was necessary to pay the debts, and he sold the whole property for a sum more than three times the amount of the debts, it was held proper to set aside the sale as against a purchaser with notice.¹

A purchaser who is one of the distributees is not entitled to have the sale set aside because the consideration was excessive and was regarded as excessive by the executor.²

Fraud. A false representation by the executor or administrator, selling without an order of court, to the effect that the sale is authorized by the will, entitles the purchaser who was thereby misled and induced to buy to a rescission of the contract in equity.³ A sale may be set aside where it is made to appear that it is tainted with fraud and collusion between the executor and the purchaser by reason

Fair sale for full value

Where, at an executor's sale pursuant to a power contained in the will, the executor is, either directly or indirectly, the purchaser, it is immaterial that he paid full value for the land, and that no actual fraud was intended, as such sale may be avoided in a suit by the interested parties.—Johnson v. of which the interests of the estate or of the heirs or devisees have been injuriously affected;⁴ and it has been held that the mere fact that in conducting the sale the executor placed himself in antagonism to the interests of the devisees, by collusion with the real purchaser, was sufficient to entitle the devisees to have the sale set aside whether or not they were in fact prejudiced.⁵ An heir attacking a sale by an executor empowered by the will to sell real estate devised to him in trust for beneficiaries and divide the proceeds, on the ground that the power of sale had failed as to the share which passed to the heir because of the invalidity of the gift of such share, may also question the sale on the ground of the fraud of the executor.⁶

In some states, jurisdiction of the probate court to set aside an executor's sale for fraud has been denied,⁷ this being a matter of which equity takes jurisdiction;⁸ but under some statutes the probate court is given this jurisdiction⁹ unless the circumstances are such that the estate is no longer interested.¹⁰

Want or failure of consideration. Mere inadequacy of price is not usually considered a sufficient ground for setting aside a sale by an executor,¹¹ but it is otherwise where the inadequacy is so gross as to indicate fraud, undue advantage, improvidence, or an abuse of the power conferred.¹² In some states the fact that on a resale a sum at least ten per cent greater than that paid at the first sale, exclusive of the expenses of the resale, can be obtained, is a sufficient ground for setting aside the sale and ordering a resale.¹³

A sale may also be set aside for failure of consideration.¹⁴ The mere fact that an executor received Confederate currency in payment for his testator's land sold by him was held not ground for setting the sale aside if the payment was made and received in good faith.¹⁵

b. Persons Entitled to Attack Sale

In a proper case, creditors, legatees, distributees, devisees, and heirs may attack a sale of realty made by the executor pursuant to a power contained in the will.

Creditors,¹⁶ legatees,¹⁷ or distributees¹⁸ are in such immediate interest that if the proceeds of an improper, fraudulent, or improvident sale of realty by the executor under a power in the will are insufficient to settle their specific claims in full they may seek redress; but devisees¹⁹ or heirs²⁰ are usually the persons injuriously affected by an improper sale, and these may proceed by virtue of their several interests, where the sale should be set aside. Even these, however, may be estopped to attack the sale,²¹ and this is the result where they have ratified or acquiesced in the sale, received their respective portions of the purchase money, or otherwise participated knowingly in the benefits of the transaction.²²

Proceedings by the executor or administrator to set aside a sale may be upheld in a case where he himself is free from fault;²³ but an executor or administrator who becomes a party to improper dealings with the estate or who himself is culpable as to the occasion of setting the sale aside, especially when he receives the proceeds, cannot be heard in equity to impeach the sale of the land or to deny its validity.²⁴

Strangers or third persons having no interest in the estate cannot make any attack on the sale.²⁵

The remedy of a pretermitted child, with respect to realty conveyed by the executor, is by suit to quiet title or partition or both, and not, in the absence of fraud, by a suit to set aside the conveyance.²⁶

c. Proceedings

A sale of realty by an executor under testamentary authority will not be set aside on objections to the final account of the executor. A proceeding to set aside the sale must be brought within the proper time and the general rules as to pleading, parties, and evidence usually apply.

A contention that a sale of real estate by an executor under testamentary authority should be set aside because made for an inadequate sum cannot be considered on objections to his final accounting.²⁷ Where there is no showing that plaintiff secured any part of the purchase price, the fact that there is no offer to return the price is immaterial,²⁸ nor is an attempt to secure the removal of the executor a condition precedent to the exercise by creditors of an insolvent estate of their right to set aside an unauthorized sale of realty.²⁹ A petition to set aside a sale of land which an executor had bought at his own sale will not be dismissed because another beneficiary had filed exceptions to the executor's account for the purpose of surcharging him with the profits of the sale nor because such exceptant had joined in the petition to set aside the sale.³⁰

On a proceeding to set aside the sale for inadequacy of price, the court may require the petitioner to file a bond conditioned that the property will bring a higher price at a resale.³¹

Time. An action to set aside the sale may be barred by laches³² or by the failure to institute the action within the time limited by the governing statute.³³

Parties. The purchaser³⁴ as well as the executor must be made a party to proceedings to avoid a sale of real estate made by the executor.³⁵

Pleadings. Complainant must make out a case for relief in his pleadings,³⁶ and a party is bound by the admissions in his pleadings.³⁷ A submission on the petition and answer admits the allegations of fact in the answer not in conflict with the accompanying exhibits.³⁸

(1) Presumption is that testator has debts to be paid, in absence of anything to contrary.—Wood v. Bowden, 185 S.E. 516, 182 Ga. 329.

burden of proof,⁴⁰ admissibility,⁴¹ and weight and sufficiency⁴² of evidence, ordinarily apply in proceedings to set aside a sale of realty by the executor under a power contained in the will. Persons complaining of the exercise of a power of sale to pay debts have the burden of showing that there were no debts when the sale was made.⁴³

Judgment and findings. On setting aside a purchase by the representative at his own sale, it is the duty of the court to adjust the equities between the parties.⁴⁴ When a representative's sale to himself is set aside by the court the annulment must be complete, it cannot be partial;⁴⁵ but a judgment setting aside such a sale affects only those who are before the court when it is rendered.⁴⁶ The court may set aside the sale only as to those heirs who seek to have it vacated.⁴⁷

The court can render judgment based on a finding of fraud in the sale although there was no finding of fraud as to the contract pursuant to which the conveyance was made.⁴⁸ The failure to find that a sale was necessary did not render erroneous a judgment adjudging the validity of the sale by the executor, where the petition alleged the need of a sale.⁴⁹

Review. Where a will gives the executor a power of sale of land, he has a right of appeal from an order setting aside a sale made under the power.⁵⁰

Resale. Where a sale is set aside, the original purchaser has no standing to question the power of the court to direct a resale.⁵¹

§ 295. Divested Purchaser's Rights, Remedies, and Liabilities

Where an executor's sale of realty under testamentary authority is set aside, the purchaser is generally entitled to be restored to his former position.

A purchaser of realty from an executor must rely on the covenants in his deed,⁵² or on the personal liability of the executor,⁵³ and cannot usually have relief against the heirs or devisees in case the property is lost to him through a defect of title or a lack of authority to sell in the executor.⁵⁴ However, restitution of the purchase money or payments made is favored in equity as far as possible, where an unauthorized sale is set aside, especially if the purchaser has parted with his consideration in good faith,⁵⁵ and the estate or the beneficiaries have received benefit therefrom;⁵⁶ and where debts of the estate have been paid out of the proceeds of an invalid sale, the divested purchaser is usually held to be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors and to be indemnified out of the land,⁵⁷ although this has been denied.⁵⁸

On the setting aside of a sale by an executor or administrator the purchaser may be called on to account for rents and profits;⁵⁹ but he has been allowed reimbursements for necessary expenditures for the preservation of the property⁶⁰ and compensation for proper improvements,⁶¹ although interest on the purchase money has been denied.⁶² It has been held that where a sale of realty has been set aside because made to the representative's agent, the extent of the interest of the legatees ought to be as-

(2) Where executor advertises and makes sale for purported purpose of paying debts, presumption that there are debts to be paid obtains in favor of innocent purchaser, notwithstanding sale is made five years after testator's death.—Wood v. Bowden, supra.

§ 296. Liabilities of Executor or Administrator

The executor must account for the consideration received on the sale of realty under testamentary authority.

An executor or administrator selling land pursuant to testamentary authority is chargeable with the consideration acknowledged or shown to have been received by him in the transaction,⁶⁴ and any profit arising from such a sale beyond his just recompense belongs properly not to the representative personally, but to those beneficially interested in the estate.⁶⁵ He is ordinarily to be charged only with what was actually obtained or received by him;⁶⁶ and as he is required to exercise, in making the sale, merely such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in conducting his own affairs,⁶⁷ he is not, in the absence of fraud or negligence, liable for selling at a price less than what might have been obtained.⁶⁸ However, he may be surcharged in his account with such price as he ought to have obtained rather than with that which was actually realized, where culpable negligence or misconduct on his part induced a loss,⁶⁹ or where he or his close relative was the purchaser,⁷⁰ and he must also account for the profits made by a resale of the property to a bona fide purchaser;⁷¹ but he is not chargeable with the value of land bid off by him at his sale, but lost through want of title in the testator.⁷² Where the personal representative has improperly become the purchaser at a sale unnecessarily made by him, the heirs or devisees have a remedy in equity against him to compel a reconveyance of the property or a payment of the excess of the value, as ascertained by a second sale, over the price paid.⁷³

An agreement by an executor in a contract of sale to buy off the widow's dower right or to pay off encumbrances created by the testator binds, not the estate, but only the executor personally.⁷⁴ If the executor makes false representations concerning the land he is to sell he is personally liable;⁷⁵ but an executor who sells real estate under a power in the will does not become personally liable in case of a failure of title.⁷⁶ Executors who have conveyed, under a power of sale, land of which their testator was in equity a mere trustee are liable as such to the person having the equitable title to such land for the damages sustained by him to the extent of the purchase money.⁷⁷ An executor may be held personally liable for loss arising from his failure to sell land as directed in the will.⁷⁸

Where an executor pays a full and fair price at a sale of land of the estate, where there was competitive bidding and no evidence to warrant that any advantage was taken or profit acquired by the executor by and through any use or abuse of his trust, such executor cannot be held liable to the estate for the price realized at a subsequent resale, when by the course of events the property had increased in value.—Blackmon v. (1) Liability of executrices who sold mortgaged realty subject to mortgage must be determined by law in force during their administration.—In re Rogers' Estate, 273 N. Y.S. 1, 241 App.Div. 553, affirming 255 N.Y.S. 745, 142 Misc. 572.

a. In General

As a general rule an executor or administrator has no authority to lease his decedent's realty, unless authorized to do so by virtue of testamentary or statutory provisions or an order of court.

As a general rule an executor or administrator is without authority to lease his decedent's land,⁸⁰ but such power may exist by virtue of testamentary or statutory provisions or an order of court,⁸¹ or by reason of the terms of a prior lease existing at the time of decedent's death.⁸² If such authority is conferred at all it must be strictly pursued,⁸³ otherwise the rights of heirs, devisees, or other benefici-

(2) Any liability of executrices-legatees to one who some two years later acquired mortgage, subject to which executrices had sold decedent's realty, must be asserted in manner prescribed by statute for pursuing assets of estates into hands of distributees, and not by proceeding to reopen an accounting, reinstate the executrices, and surcharge their account for amount of deficiency judgment obtained against the executrices as such long after their discharge.—In re Rogers' Estate, supra.

Derivation of power

The power of an executor to lease is derived only from the express terms of the will or the statutes.—In re Flesham's Estate, 5 P.2d 727, 51 Idaho 312.

Power conferred by will

(1) Will giving testatrix' foster son "revenue" from estate, and giving executor full power to administer estate in son's interest, gave management to executor, and therefore lease by executor was valid.—In re Jensen's Estate, 247 N.W. 392, 216 Iowa 15.

(2) Active executors were authorized by will to bind estate by extending term of mining lease, but not to remit any part of agreed price for such extension.—House v. Moore, Tex.Civ.App., 271 S.W. 244.

(3) Other cases see 24 C.J. p 191 note 58 [a].

Oil and gas lease

(1) Where the will did not confer the power of sale on the executor he was without authority to grant an oil and gas lease, as such a lease conveys an interest in the land itself.—Smith v. Womack, Tex.Civ.App., 231 S.W. 840, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

(2) Other cases see 24 C.J. p 191 note 58 [f].

Conflict of statutes

Statute providing for renting of real estate by executor or administrator for purpose of paying debts does not conflict with statute relative to management by executor or administrator of neglected real estate needing care and attention until such time as the heirs or legatees appear.—Rollins v. Shaner, 292 S.W. 419, 316 Mo. 953.

Signature as representative

Where lease giving lessees right to renew for additional term of one year showed on its face that it was made on behalf of deceased's estate, failure of executor in signing lease to add his official title to signature did not prevent estate from being bound thereby.—Courts v. Golden, 12 N.Y.S.2d 621, 257 App. Div. 31.

Notice of application for order to lease

In jurisdictions where an order of court authorizing the lease is required, an application to lease the real estate must be on notice to those interested in the property.—Martin v. Neal, 25 N.E. 813, 125 Ind. 547.

24 C.J. p 191 note 59.

Necessity for approval by court

(1) The statutes authorizing an executor to rent land belonging to estate authorize the renting of land by an executor without an order of the probate court approving the rent contract.—Maddox v. Smart, Tex.Civ.App., 140 S.W.2d 579, error refused.

(2) Where executor was directed to "use" revenues of the estate for certain purposes, leases could be made only with probate court's approval.—In re Flesham's Estate, 5 P.2d 727, 51 Idaho 312.

Cancellation of contract renting land

The statute providing for approval or disapproval of an executor's report of a contract renting land belonging to estate does not authorize the cancellation of such contract or determination of rental value by probate court as against executor's lessee merely on ground that probate court is of opinion that amount of rent agreed on between executor and lessee is insufficient.—Maddox v. Smart, Tex.Civ.App., 140 S.W.2d 579, error refused.

To whom land may be leased

(1) Lease by executor to own son is illegal.—In re Flesham's Estate, 5 P.2d 727, 51 Idaho 312.

(2) Administrator's lease of estate's property to partner is improper.—In re Laberee's Estate, 269 P. 861, 126 Or. 301.

Adequacy of rent

Rent of five thousand dollars per year for trust property worth one

aries in such property are not controlled or concluded.⁸⁴ The executor is bound by directions given him by the testator,⁸⁵ and can lease only in accordance with the conditions prescribed.⁸⁶

A court order permitting the execution of a lease on the petition of an unauthorized person is void and will not support the lease.⁸⁷

A power to sell does not authorize the making of a lease of the property.⁸⁸

The acquiescence of heirs or devisees, or their waiver of their rights, may operate to validate the acts of an executor or administrator in leasing the lands of decedent,⁸⁹ but it has been held that the trustees of a residuary estate are not estopped to maintain an action to enjoin the executrix from leasing and collecting rents from residuary real estate by acquiescence in previous acts of the executrix of the same character.⁹⁰

Upholding lease as individual lease. Where a widow and executrix who was also the sole legatee and devisee, except as to two dollars left to testator's children, executed a lease to property styling herself "administratrix and executrix" of the estate, without any order of court, it was held that as the property had become hers under the will, and the lease thus became her individual contract, she could elect to treat the words "administratrix and executrix" as words of personal description, so that the lease should be good as her individual lease.⁹¹

Where an administrator is also a coheir and co-devisee, his lease of the realty without authority is an act in his capacity as a tenant in common with his coheirs and codevisees and not as administrator.⁹² An administratrix who executes a lease individually and as administratrix is bound individually as to her interest in the property as much as though she had made a separate lease.⁹³

Appointment of receiver to rent land. In a case where a large amount of vacant land formed a part of the estate, it was held proper to appoint a receiver to rent the land, pending an action by the executor to construe the will, to allot dower to the widow, and to settle the estate.⁹⁴

b. Term

Leases of realty by executors and administrators should ordinarily be for short terms and should not extend beyond the time prescribed by statute or by the will, hundred fifteen thousand dollars, four fifths of which was leased by administrator to lessee, was adequate, where lessee advanced seven years' rent without interest to rebuild building which was destroyed by fire, and invested nineteen thousand dollars in improvements, which made the rent about the average paid in best business block in the city, notwithstanding rents advanced after lease was executed and lessee subleased space at rate in excess of what it was paying.—Carter v. Boone County Trust Co., Mo., 92 S.W.2d 647.

Excuse for laches in applying for leave

Where intestate died on November 28, 1935, administrator was granted letters on November 22, 1937, and administrator filed petition asking for decree to lease intestate's realty on April 17, 1939, administrator's delay was excused by his desire, if possible, to obtain payment of intestate's debts and funeral expenses without instituting any proceeding, and thus save all parties expense.—In re Lindsay's Estate, 18 N.Y.S.2d 800.

Special administrator

Where order appointing bank special administrator was void, lease of estate lands executed by such special administrator was likewise void.—Texas Co. v. Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n, supra.

Persons entitled to make lease

(1) Evidence that executrix who had leased land in which decedent owned undivided interest obtained order for sale of premises to pay debts subject to rights of lessee, that rent was paid to her and to the owners of the other undivided interest, and that no one interested in the land questioned her right to receive the rents, showed that she was in legal possession so as to have authority to make the lease.—Wright v. Zachgo, 271 N.W. 512, 222 Iowa 1368.

Acceptance of rent

(1) Beneficiary of trust created by will is estopped to deny right of administrator to execute lease whereby seven years' rent was advanced by lessee and used to help rebuild building which had been destroyed by fire, where beneficiary did not object to lease when made and accepted income derived from building from other tenants without objection for seven years.—Carter v. Boone County Trust Co., 92 S.W.2d 647, 338 Mo. 629.

(2) Other cases see 24 C.J. p 191 note 63 [a].

Void or voidable act of representative

The heirs of an estate may ratify not only voidable but also void acts of the administrator including his leasing of land of decedent.—Tide Water Associated Oil Co. v. Curtin, 107 P.2d 945, 41 Cal.App.2d 884.

94. Ky.—Clay v. Anderson, 132 S. W. 1039, 141 Ky. 455.

although a lease for an unauthorized term may be ratified by the heirs.

Leases of realty by executors or administrators, when authorized, should ordinarily be for short terms,⁹⁵ and under some statutes the term of the lease may not extend beyond the time when the debts against the estate have been paid and the estate settled.⁹⁶ Under statutes restricting the power to lease to the period allowed for the settlement of an estate, any lease made for a definite term is subject to termination by the final settlement of the estate and discharge of the representative.⁹⁷ A statute providing that no executor shall rent the real estate, unless ordered by the probate court to do so for a term not exceeding two years, does not mean that the executor, at the expiration of two years from the date of the order of court, ipso facto loses all control or interest in the land, but only that he may not rent the land for a longer term.⁹⁸ A lease for a long period of time may be sustained if it is within the power granted by the will.⁹⁹

A lease for a term longer than the authorized period is voidable rather than void¹ and may be ratified by the heirs.²

c. Recovery of Rent

A personal representative's power to lease realty includes the power to receive and collect rent and the tenant cannot dispute the representative's power to lease.

A power in the personal representative to lease carries with it the power to receive and collect rent;³ and a tenant who takes possession under a lease from the representative⁴ and pays rent thereunder⁵ cannot dispute the representative's power to make the contract and is liable for the rental agreed on.⁶ Where the power to lease exists, an invalid option to purchase given in connection with the lease does not prevent a recovery of the rent.⁷ However, a lessee from an administrator without authority to lease the premises is not required to pay rent thereon after he has vacated the premises following a sale thereof on petition of the heirs, even though the sale was not confirmed by the court.⁸

A lessee from an executor cannot purchase judgments against the testator and set them off against the rent unless the executor acknowledges a sufficiency of assets to pay all the debts of the estate.⁹

d. Recovery of Possession; Waste

While the estate remains unsettled the personal representative is the proper party to sue to recover possession of realty leased by him. A representative who has no interest as an individual in the property may sue on covenants in the lease against committing waste.

The personal representative is the proper person to bring an action to recover possession from a tenant holding under a lease of realty from him, while the estate remains unsettled;¹⁰ and the tenant cannot defeat a judgment for recovery of possession of the property and impeach the personal representative's title by setting up an outstanding legal title in another, without first surrendering to the representative the possession obtained under the tenancy.¹¹

A trustee appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction to administer a trust created by the will and a purchaser from such trustee are entitled to recover possession of realty belonging to the trust estate as against a lessee of the administrator with the will annexed, who took no interest in the real estate by virtue of his appointment.¹²

Actions for waste. Although an executor who has no interest as reversioner cannot maintain an action against a lessee for waste committed on premises leased by him, he may maintain an action on covenants in the lease against committing waste.¹³

e. Rights of Lessee

Where a lease of realty executed by the personal representative is void, the lessee may be entitled to a return of the consideration paid.

Where a lease of realty executed by a personal representative is void because of the invalidity of his appointment, the lessee, never having exercised any rights under the lease, is entitled to recover the consideration paid;¹⁴ in such case the rule of caveat emptor does not apply.¹⁵ However, the doctrine of caveat emptor is applicable in so far as the estate's title to the demised property is concerned;¹⁶ an executor's or administrator's lease does not imply any covenant of quiet enjoyment,¹⁷ and, if the lessee loses part or all of the land, he cannot recover back from the estate the rent paid or any portion thereof.¹⁸

Changing terms of lease. Until the lease expires, the executor or administrator cannot, without the consent of the lessee, change the terms of a lease made by a prior executor or administrator.¹⁹

f. Duty to Rent and Liability of Representative

A personal representative, authorized to lease the decedent's realty, is not chargeable with neglect merely by his failure to lease the property, but he must exercise ordinary prudence in determining whether the premises should be leased.

Although an executor or administrator may be authorized by statute to lease the realty of decedent, he is not chargeable with neglect merely by his failure to lease the property.²⁰ In determining whether the premises should be leased, he must exercise ordinary prudence in the light of the surrounding circumstances.²¹ Where he possesses the real estate only for the purpose of using the funds derived therefrom to pay charges against the estate, an abundance of other assets to pay such charges may justify him in permitting the heirs to occupy the lands without charge, even in the absence of permission from the court;²² but where he has reason to anticipate that the estate cannot be settled for a considerable period of time, ordinary prudence requires that he make a reasonable attempt to rent the real estate in his possession.²³ An administrator who has power to rent out real estate, but through whose negligence it is not rented, is chargeable with the rental value,²⁴ at least where the assets of the estate are insufficient to discharge the valid claims against it;²⁵ but where executors are given a naked power to sell real estate, without the

legal title or the right to possession, they are not liable for the rents which might have been made by leasing the same until a sale could be made.²⁶ Where an executor contracts to lease the real estate, under a power in the will, and dies before performance, his own estate is not liable for the breach.²⁷

If the representative rents out the land of his decedent he holds the rent collected as assets of the estate, and for the use of those legally entitled to it,²⁸ and he cannot escape liability therefor by setting up that he leased the land without authority.²⁹ He is not liable for losses of rent which could not have been avoided by the exercise of good faith and ordinary prudence and diligence;³⁰ nor is he chargeable with unlawful renting of the land where, in the mistaken belief that the lease is for a longer term than it actually is, he permits the lessee to hold over after its expiration, without a new lease being executed and without the approval of the probate judge, where it is not shown that the rent was inadequate or that the estate suffered thereby;³¹ but for losses resulting from his fraud or culpable negligence, whether in reference to collection, taking security, or otherwise, he is liable.³²

An executor or administrator who enters into a lease without authority is personally liable thereon.³³ Under some statutes an executor who may rent the property without first obtaining a court order approving the rental contract may avoid personal liability by obtaining an order of approval prior to renting it.³⁴

§ 298. Mortgage

- a. In general
- b. Authorization by court
- c. Stipulations and provisions of mortgage; construction
- d. Title, rights, and liabilities of mortgagee
- e. Right to attack mortgage
- f. Personal liability of representative
- g. Effect of unauthorized mortgage

a. In General

Unless authorized by statute or by the terms of a will, a personal representative may not mortgage the decedent's realty, although the consent or acquiescence of the beneficiaries may validate an unauthorized mortgage.

The personal representative cannot, merely by virtue of his office, mortgage the lands of his decedent,³⁵ even though the money obtained thereby is for the benefit of the estate;³⁶ and where there is no statutory authorization for the administrator to mortgage the realty of the estate, the obtaining of a court order authorizing such a transaction will not render the mortgage valid.³⁷

However, authority to mortgage decedent's realty may be and frequently is conferred by will, or by statute authorizing this to be done pursuant to an

Under power to sell

In jurisdictions where a direction in a will to sell land works an equitable conversion of it into personality as of the date of the death of the testator, executors who lease realty which the will directs them to sell have the responsibility of accounting for the rent as part of the assets of the estate.—Ihle v. Costs of collection Estate fiduciaries, acting as officers of corporation owning realty, must seek rent collection service at market price and will be surcharged for loss from diminution of income by payment of more than such price on proper objection.—In re Witkind's Estate, 4 N.Y.S.2d 933, 167 Misc. 885.

Necessity for order of court see infra subdivision b of this section.

Applicability of statute

The statute governing sale and mortgage of decedent's lands when personality is insufficient to pay debts is inapplicable where will provides for equitable conversion and sale of realty, and executor is continuing testator's business under court supervision and with the consent of all interested parties.—Ottstadt v. Jardine, 281 N.W. 644, 229 Wis. 85.

Construction of testamentary power

(1) The fact that final clause of paragraph of testator's will which authorized executor to execute mortgage directed that proceeds of mortgage should be invested did not diminish the power granted, nor limit the executor to execution of a mortgage for investment purposes only.—In re Clyde's Estate, 198 A. 640, 329 Pa. 552, 115 A.L.R. 1412.

(2) Other cases see 24 C.J. p 193 note 89 [b].

Successive mortgages

Where power to mortgage is given to the executor, it is not exhausted by a single exercise, but he may execute successive mortgages on the property.

U.S.—Ames v. Holderbaum, C.C. Iowa, 44 F. 224.

Iowa.—Iowa Loan & Trust Co. v. Holderbaum, 52 N.W. 550, 86 Iowa 1.

Trust deeds

(1) Section of statute relative to execution of trust deeds by executors, administrators, and guardians confers on such persons right to execute trust deeds.—Schwan v. Superior Court in and for Orange County, 266 P. 532, 204 Cal. 61.

(2) Abortive attempt to amend one section of statute relative to execution of trust deeds by executors and administrators does not preclude execution under other section sufficient to authorize exercise of such power without amended section.—Schwan v. Superior Court in and for Orange County, supra.

(3) Statute permitting execution of trust deeds by executors and administrators is applicable, although decedent died prior to passage of amendment.—Schwan v. Superior Court in and for Orange County, supra.

Property which may be mortgaged

(1) The personal representative cannot mortgage property which decedent held as trustee.—In re Doyle's Estate, 233 N.Y.S. 667, 133 Misc. 647.

(2) The administrator or county court acquires no jurisdiction to mortgage the homestead of intestate, where she leaves surviving no husband, but unmarried minor children residing on said homestead, and, if said mortgage is executed, a court of equity has the power to set the same aside at the instance of the minor children.—Pioneer Mortgage Co. v. Carter, 202 P. 513, 84 Okl. 85.

Consideration

The forbearance of creditor from bringing action to establish lien on testator's realty was sufficient consideration for mortgage executed by executor.—In re Clyde's Estate, 198 A. 640, 329 Pa. 552, 115 A.L.R. 1412.

Payment of indebtedness out of rents

(1) Where the mortgage was validly executed, the rents collected by the executor from decedent's realty may be rightfully applied to the indebtedness secured thereby.—In re Clyde's Estate, supra.

(2) Executor could rightfully claim exoneration out of the assets of the estate in his hands for payments of interest made on note secured by the mortgage.—In re Clyde's Estate, supra.

(3) Rents of realty as available for payment of decedent's debts see infra § 480.

Presumption of validity

(1) Under a will giving executors power to mortgage real estate, the paramount title to the property is in the executors, the interest of the heirs at law being that of cestuis que trust or remaindermen, and a mortgage by the executors will be presumed valid, in the absence of attack by the heirs at law.—Field v. Chronik, 179 N.Y.S. 391, 190 App. Div. 501.

24 C.J. p 194 note 92.

Time of execution

Where executor authorizedly agreed, within time during which creditor could have instituted suit to establish lien on testator's realty, to execute mortgage to induce creditor to forbear the institution of such suit, the fact that mortgage was not actually given within time for bringing suit did not defeat executor's right to exoneration for payments thereon out of the estate.—In re Clyde's Estate, 198 A. 640, 329 Pa. 552, 115 A.L.R. 1412.

42. Pa.—Columbia Ave. Sav.-Fund, Safe-Deposit, Title & Trust Co. v. Lewis, 42 A. 1094, 190 Pa. 558.

Particular purposes

(1) Under will devising farm to testator's children for life with remainder to testator's grandchildren, life tenants to maintain farm in then state of cultivation and in good repair, executors to have power to pledge land to pay debts if necessary, executors could mortgage land to pay debts, but not to pay for improvements.—Matherly v. Johnson's Ex'r, 71 S.W.2d 663, 254 Ky. 307.

(2) Under will authorizing executor to mortgage estate if he deemed it necessary for support of testator's wife or advantageous to the estate, the executor had authority to execute mortgage to induce creditor to forbear institution of action to establish lien on testator's realty.—In re Clyde's Estate, 198 A. 640, 329 Pa. 552, 115 A.L.R. 1412.

(3) Where business enterprises had been disposed of by executrix and life tenant, whom chancellor had authorized to exchange farm for town property, testamentary power to sell and mortgage property to pay testator's debts or to conduct such business enterprises, gave executrix and life tenant no power to mortgage town property to secure money to pay taxes and amount owed for new roof.—Old Nat. Bank v. Swearingen, 72 S.W.2d 545, 167 Tenn. 529.

and the same is true of a statutory power.⁴³ However, in jurisdictions in which the statutes do not limit the purposes for which a mortgage by an executor or administrator may be authorized, but in which the whole matter is intrusted to the courts, the courts have general jurisdiction of such matter with power and authority to determine in every case properly presented to them whether a mortgage is for the advantage, benefit, and best interests of the estate and those interested therein.⁴⁴

Where the court possesses express statutory power to authorize a mortgage, its exercise is a matter of discretion.⁴⁵ In determining whether a mort-

Application of proceeds

(1) That balance on decedent's unsecured notes paid by executrix to payee came from proceeds of a mortgage given by executrix did not affect payee's right to apply such payment on the notes, especially since payee was not under duty to inquire where executrix obtained the money.—Farmers Trust Co. of Lancaster v. Schlottzauer, 179 A. 227, 319 Pa. 125.

(2) Where deceased's creditor fixed lien on realty by suing on unsecured notes within year after death, and executor, under power of sale in will, mortgaged realty and out of proceeds paid balance on the notes, whereupon creditor released the lien of such debt, creditor was not precluded from thereafter enforcing decedent's mortgages securing a different debt, as against heirs' contention that executrix' mortgage was void and that proceeds became impressed with trust in favor of heirs and constituted set-off to balance due on decedent's mortgages.—Farmers Trust Co. of Lancaster v. Schlottzauer, supra.

(3) To pay taxes and assessments against the premises.—Long v. Landman, 76 N.W. 374, 118 Mich. 174.

(4) To pay existing mortgage and delinquent taxes on lands of intestate's widow and minor children.—Lynch v. Stanton, 167 S.E. 392, 168 S.C. 249.

(5) To obtain funds to pay expenses of administration.—In re Lair's Estate, 102 P.2d 436, 38 Cal. App.3d 737.

(6) If amount of cash on hand, together with amount owed by executors to estate, was insufficient to pay claim against estate and executors' and attorney's fees, and heirs would not advance sufficient funds, executors could apply for leave to mortgage sufficient estate property to pay the claim and fees, and court could then distribute estate to heirs subject to such mortgage.—In re Ryan's Estate, 96 P.2d 916, 109 Mont. 340.

(7) That administrator had paid debts with money he had borrowed prior to filing petition seeking sale or mortgage of realty of decedent's estate did not preclude administrator from being subrogated to rights of creditors whose debts he had paid, and hence order of clerk approved by judge of the superior court permitting mortgaging of realty of estate was authorized.—*Caffey v. (1) Under a statute providing that an executor or administrator may borrow money to pay obligations secured by liens against any real property belonging to the estate, notes and mortgage executed by executor for money wherewith to pay unproven claims, not secured by liens on the realty of the estate, are void.—*Acker v. Debts accruing after death of decedent

Under a statute authorizing the execution of a mortgage for the "purpose of paying the debts against the estate of any deceased person," the probate court may authorize the execution of a mortgage to pay debts and charges accruing after the death of decedent.—Long v. Landman, 76 N.W. 374, 118 Mich. 174.

Property of minors

(1) When a court of equity has properly before it the estate of wards of chancery, it may in the exercise of its broad, comprehensive, and plenary jurisdiction, and for the purpose of protecting and preserving the corpus, direct the placing of a loan on their property, the payment of the loan to be secured by deed.—Davie v. Willis, 200 S.E. 283, 187 Ga. 340.

(2) Minor children of testator were wards in chancery, and superior court had jurisdiction to grant order authorizing administratrix to borrow money and to secure its payment by deed, so that order was binding on minors who were represented by guardian ad litem.—Davie v. Willis, supra.

Where indebtedness small

Where amount required to pay decedent's debts was only a small percentage of the appraised value of specifically devised property, court

gage should be authorized, the court should be guided by general legal and equitable principles.⁴⁶

Power to sell as authorizing mortgage. Although there is some authority to the contrary,⁴⁷ as a general rule a mere power to sell realty does not authorize the making of a mortgage by the personal representative.⁴⁸ However, a power to sell may include a power to mortgage,⁴⁹ but only, it has been held, because of some exceptional reason, as where there is a particular charge to which the devise is subject, and it is proper to raise money to meet it.⁵⁰ So, in jurisdictions where the mere power to sell does not imply the power to mortgage, as well as in those where it does, it has been held that if the power to sell was for the payment of debts, or of a specific charge, and the property was devised subject thereto, a power to mortgage may be implied from the power to sell, unless the will shows a contrary intent.⁵¹ It has been held that, where the representative has petitioned for an order to sell real estate to pay debts, an order directing him to mortgage such real estate is invalid.⁵²

Parties. Where a mortgage of decedent's realty is authorized, the mortgage should be executed by an executor or administrator who has been duly qualified.⁵⁴ The executor or administrator may not mortgage the realty to himself.⁵⁵

b. Authorization by Court

Except where the power to mortgage is expressly conferred by will, an application for leave of court is ordinarily essential to warrant the execution of such an instrument.

In the absence of a statutory requirement an order of court is unnecessary to authorize the execution of a mortgage under a power expressly conferred by a will.⁵⁶ Where the power is not so expressly conferred it is necessary, often by express provision of the statute, that the consent or approval of the probate court to such an act by the executor or administrator be obtained,⁵⁷ the proceedings being

Jurisdiction of court

(1) Where will provided for equitable conversion and sale of realty and executor continued testator's business under court supervision with consent of all parties, county court had jurisdiction, on notice to all interested parties, to authorize executor to mortgage realty without strict compliance with statutes governing mortgage of realty to pay testator's debts, and hence mortgage executed pursuant to court order was enforceable.—Ottstadt v. Jardine, 281 N.W. 644, 229 Wis. 85.

(2) Jurisdiction of court to make order permitting estate property to be mortgaged is not dependent on administratrix' filing of account.—In re Chandler's Estate, 297 P. 638, 112 Cal.App. 606, followed in 297 P. 639, 112 Cal.App. 765.

Term of court

Where an order granting authority to borrow money and secure its payment must have been granted in term in order to be valid, it will be presumed, where it does not appear from the petition whether the order was granted in term or in chambers, that it was granted in open court during its regular session in the transaction of term business, and therefore was a proceeding in term.—Davie v. Willis, 200 S.E. 283, 187 Ga. 340.

Matters determined

(1) The matter of an accounting between executor and remaindermen was not a matter for determination on application of executor for authority to mortgage realty to secure funds to pay claims against estate, where it had been theretofore adjudicated that such claims were not proper claims for determination in a previous proceeding involving the same parties.—In re ordinarily substantially identical with those to obtain leave to sell, considered infra §§ 555-586, a mortgage being in many respects the equivalent of a sale.⁵⁸ Substantial compliance with a specific procedure prescribed by the statute for authorization of a mortgage is necessary⁵⁹ although the mortgage will not be invalidated by a mere irregularity in such proceedings.⁶⁰ Where the statute so provides, proceedings are to be instituted by a petition presented by the executor or administrator or by a creditor.⁶¹ The application or petition must contain appropriate jurisdictional recitations or the mortgage will be void and subject to cancellation,⁶² unless the defects are supplied by proof at the hearing and such fact is affirmatively stated in the order authorizing the mortgage.⁶³

Notice. Notice of the application for permission to mortgage the realty ordinarily must be given to those persons interested in the realty;⁶⁴ and where due notice is given the court has jurisdiction although the adversaries to the petition are not present at the hearing.⁶⁵ Want of notice will not render void a judgment authorizing the execution of a mortgage or other encumbrance where the adversary parties file an answer to the application.⁶⁶

Dismissal. An application for an order to mortgage real estate to pay debts, after jurisdiction of the parties is acquired, can be dismissed only by an order to that effect.⁶⁷

(2) District court had jurisdiction on administrator's application to mortgage lands to determine whether property mortgaged descended to heirs of deceased owners as exempt homestead.—Reinsurance Life Co. of America v. Houser, 227 N.W. 116, 208 Iowa 1226.

Construction of order

(1) Declaratory judgment purporting to adjudicate that executors were empowered by testator to give mortgage to secure loan of two thousand six hundred dollars to pay debts must be construed as attempting to adjudicate that executors were also empowered to include in such loan two hundred fifty dollars to pay for improvements, where petition alleged that two thousand three hundred fifty dollars was necessary to pay debts and that two hundred fifty dollars was necessary to pay for improvements.—Matherly v. Johnson's Ex'rs, 71 S.W.2d 663, 254 Ky. 307.

(2) An order authorizing execution of a trust deed on assets of an estate left by deceased in trust for maintenance of her husband, to secure payment of administration expenses which directed that form of deed should include an assignment of rent, to secure payment of note and that principal should be paid out of the whole estate, should be construed as directing payment of the principal out of the corpus of the estate and not out of the income.—In re Lair's Estate, 102 P.2d 436, 38 Cal.App.2d 737.

Effect of insufficient order

If order made by judge, who was stockholder, director, and vice president of bank, authorizing executrix of an estate to execute mortgage to secure indebtedness was not broad enough to authorize mortgage to the bank with which the judge was connected, mortgage executed by executrix to the bank was invalid for want of an order authorizing it.—Gaer v. Bank of Baker, 107 P.2d 877, 111 Mont. 204.

Subsequent approval

That an executor mortgaged property of the estate for purposes of paying debts of deceased without authorization of probate court was not ground for complaint by legatees, where no injury to estate resulted and mortgages were ratified by order of superior court approving executor's interim report.—*Bostock v. c. Stipulations and Provisions of Mortgage; Construction

A mortgage of the decedent's realty by his personal representative may contain such stipulations and provisions as are authorized by the order or license under which it is executed or which are customary in mortgages in the state where it is executed, including, in some jurisdictions, a provision for attorney fees.

Where the court has power to authorize and direct the execution of a mortgage of decedent's realty by his personal representative for the purpose of paying debts, it may determine the manner and terms of the mortgage,⁶⁸ and the percentage of property to be contributed by the various devisees or heirs.⁶⁹ Where the executor is authorized to execute a mortgage or trust deed he may insert therein such provisions as are customary in mortgages in the state where the instrument is executed,⁷⁰ but, of course, the provisions should conform to the order or license under which it is executed.⁷¹

Stipulation for attorney's fees. It has been held that authority given to the representative by will or by statute to mortgage the realty authorizes him to stipulate for the payment of attorney's fees in the event of its becoming necessary to collect the debt by suit,⁷² but there is authority which holds otherwise.⁷³ However, even if the insertion of a provision for an attorney's fee in the mortgage is unauthorized it will not invalidate the mortgage, but will only give rise to a claim for a reduction of the amount due upon it.⁷⁴

Construction. Whether or not a mortgage is that of the representative as such, or simply his individual mortgage, should, in a jurisdiction under the statutes of which a mortgage is not an instrument under seal, be determined not only from the form of the instrument itself, but by reading it in the light of the facts and circumstances attending its execution, and considering the situation of the parties.⁷⁵ A reference to the order of the court and a recital of the execution of the mortgage pursuant to such order, with other similar recitals, is sufficient to show that the mortgage was executed by the mortgagor as personal representative in pursuance of law and the court's order, and not in a personal capacity.⁷⁶

The rule of caveat emptor applies to mortgagees of realty from executors or administrators, but where the mortgagees act in good faith they are not required to ascertain the necessity for the loan or to see to its application.

The rule of caveat emptor applies to mortgagees of real property from executors or administrators,⁷⁷ and where a mortgagee lends prematurely, or the transaction is unauthorized, he obtains no title or security as against a subsequent purchaser,⁷⁸ although he will be entitled to repayment out of the proceeds of the sale.⁷⁹ Where the representative has authority to mortgage decedent's land a bona fide mortgagee who advances funds to such representative on the security of decedent's land is not bound to ascertain the necessity for the loan to the executor,⁸⁰ or to see to the application of the money realized by the mortgage;⁸¹ nor does the fact that payment of claims against the land of a testator was made by the executor without the approbation of the court affect the validity of a mortgage given under a power in the will to secure the loan with which such payment was made.⁸² However, where a mortgagee lends under such circumstances that he is chargeable with constructive notice of the executor's intention to apply the money to an improper purpose, he cannot hold the mortgage as against the estate.⁸³

A person who takes a mortgage on intestate's realty from the person in whom it vested, as security for an indebtedness of a third person, is presumed to do so with full knowledge that the premises are subject to the debts of the deceased and to know that, until the administrator takes possession of the premises or unless he institutes proceedings to sell and sells them to pay decedent's debts, it is the duty and obligation of the person in whom the title to the premises is then vested to pay the taxes and charges which accrued after decedent's death.⁸⁴

Validity of debt. A mortgage executed under a decree of the court conclusively determines that the debts named in the administrator's petition to mortgage are due.⁸⁵

e. Right to Attack Mortgage

Only persons having a beneficial interest in the property may attack a mortgage of the decedent's realty executed by the executor or administrator; such persons may be estopped to question the validity of the mortgage.

Only persons having a beneficial interest in the property are entitled to attack a mortgage of decedent's realty executed by the executor or administrator.⁸⁶ Where property charged with the payment of a legacy was sold, and the proceeds paid to the legatee in partial discharge of the legacy, neither the legatee nor a judgment creditor nor residuary devisees named in the will were entitled, in the absence of fraud on the part of the executors, to object to the validity of a mortgage executed by them on land belonging to the estate without express authority in the will, all of the proceeds of such mortgage having been applied to pay debts of the estate.⁸⁷

Estoppel. Heirs or devisees of decedent may be estopped to question the validity of a mortgage or deed of trust of realty executed by the executor or administrator.⁸⁸ Where they execute a ratification and confirmation of the mortgage or deed of trust they will be estopped to attack it for want of authority in the executor or administrator.⁸⁹ Creditors⁹⁰ and legatees⁹¹ of a testator may by their acquiescence for a number of years in the executor's management of the estate under the provisions of the will become estopped to question the validity of mortgages executed by him under authority given by the will; but although an administrator by mortgaging the land of decedent, title to which had not been perfected, was enabled to purchase it for the heirs, the latter are not estopped in an action to foreclose the mortgage to plead the invalidity of the administrator's act because of the benefits resulting to them, it appearing that the money was not borrowed by the heirs or by anyone in their name or at their request.⁹²

Where there is no statutory authorization for the administrator to mortgage the realty of the estate, the obtaining of a court order authorizing such a transaction will not estop him from subsequently attacking its validity, where all the debts are not paid and the legal duties of administration are uncompleted.⁹³ The executors are estopped in their capacity as devisees from denying the validity of a mortgage executed by them as executors.⁹⁴ One to whom property has been mortgaged under order of court must show that the estate, by the administrator, was actually the recipient of the money in order to ask that the estate be estopped to plead illegality of the mortgage.⁹⁵

The rule of the text is true even though all the heirs at law join in the application to the court, since, while the administrator as an individual and the heirs might thus estop themselves, the administrator could not by such illegal acts and conduct estop himself as the representative of the estate with unperformed duties to creditors.—Field v. Manly, supra.

Collateral attack. An order of court authorizing the executor or administrator to mortgage the estate's realty is not open to collateral attack, even if erroneously entered, if the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the persons.⁹⁶ Where a court has general jurisdiction to determine when a mortgage of realty by an executor or administrator should be authorized, the determination of the court on that question in a proceeding in which there is substantial compliance with the statutory requirements as to petition and notice is not, in the absence of fraud, open to collateral attack.⁹⁷

Under certain circumstances a personal representative who mortgages his decedent's real estate may be individually liable.

Under certain circumstances a personal representative who mortgages the realty of his decedent may be personally liable.⁹⁸ A mortgage executed without authority by an executor who is also interested in the estate, while not binding on the estate is, it has been held, binding on him personally to the extent of his individual interest in the property.⁹⁹ It has been held that where an executor, empowered by a will to mortgage his testator's property, executes a mortgage in his capacity as executor containing warranties of title and a promise to pay taxes and attorney's fees, and gives his notes for the money secured thereby, he is personally bound therefor, as giving the notes and making the warranties are not necessary to the execution of the power.¹ Executors of a grantee of mortgaged premises, who executed a mortgage extension agreement, have been held individually liable for payment of the mortgage debt and a deficiency judgment resulting from a sale of the premises, although the agreement described them as executors.²

An unauthorized mortgage of the decedent's realty by his personal representative does not create an equitable lien on the mortgaged property or other assets of the estate, but where the money lent was used to pay debts of the estate it is bound in equity to repay the amount with interest.

Where a mortgage of decedent's realty by his personal representative was unauthorized, the fact that the money lent thereon was used to pay debts of the estate gives the lender no equitable lien on the mortgaged property or other assets,³ but under such circumstances the estate is bound in equity to repay the amount advanced with interest.⁴ An action to set aside an invalid mortgage by the representative may be maintained without the complaining party first paying the amount owed to the mortgagee.⁵

A mortgage authorized and approved by the orphans' court cannot be attacked in any other court, unless for fraud.—Mendenhall v. Jackson, 110 A. 799, 268 Pa. 123.

Admissibility of extrinsic evidence

In action to foreclose real estate mortgage executed by executor pursuant to order of proper court regular on its face, made in response to petition for leave to execute mortgage likewise regular on its face and sufficient in substance, evidence that order to show cause designated April 23 as date for hearing of petition which actually took place on April 18 was inadmissible to impeach validity of order authorizing execution of mortgage, and, although such evidence was introduced by plaintiff and admitted, court properly ordered foreclosure of mortgage.—Corporation of America v. Bank of America

Nat. Trust & Savings Ass'n, 46 P. 2d 262, 7 Cal.App.2d 470.

Matters examined on collateral attack

Attack on order granting executor leave to mortgage real property of estate, where made in action to foreclose mortgage, constituted collateral attack, requiring court to limit itself to examination of matters which appeared on face of record in proceeding which resulted in entry of order, and to uphold order, if no defect of jurisdiction appeared on face of record, despite showing of error in exercise of jurisdiction, or of irregularity in proceeding, and requiring court, in examining record, to indulge usual presumptions in favor of regularity and validity of proceeding.—Corporation of America v. L. PERSONAL PROPERTY

1. IN GENERAL

§ 299. Title and Authority

- a. In general
- b. Nature of title
- c. When title vests; relation back
- d. Duration and termination of title

a. In General

Except as modified by statute, the general rule is that the executor or administrator acquires the legal title to the personality of the deceased, including that specifically bequeathed.

It is well established that as a general rule the legal title to personal property of which decedent died possessed does not vest at his death in his next of kin or distributees, see Descent and Distribution § 67, but vests, for the time being, in his executor or administrator,⁶ who is the proper person to follow such property into the hands of others or dispose of it.⁷ The general rule has been modified by statute in a few jurisdictions so that the title to personal property vests in the heirs or beneficiaries, subject to the payment of debts and to the representative's right of possession.⁸ Further, when Executor or administrator as legatee or distributee see infra § 486.

 What constitutes personality to be administered as assets see supra § 97 et seq.

Title to nonexempt personality passes to the personal representative.—Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., v. Snider, 148 So. 831, 227 Ala. 126.

Title and other benefits

Except as otherwise provided by statute, the personal representative succeeds not only to the title of the personality, but also to all benefits accruing from the prior actual possession of his decedent.—Page v. Skinner, 125 So. 36, 220 Ala. 302.

Domiciliary representative

Subject to the right of a foreign state to administer property within its borders for protection of its own citizens, the domiciliary representative becomes invested with title to all personal property of deceased.—New York Trust Co. v. Riley, Del., 16 A.2d 772, reversing Coca-Cola International Corporation v. New York Trust Co., Ch., 8 A.2d 811, and certiorari granted *Riley v. there is no need for administration on decedent's estate, or when decedent's personal property has gone, without administration, where it rightfully belongs, and would go by administration, the administrator's naked legal title will not prevail in equity against one to whom the equitable title and rightful possession have passed.⁹

Property specifically bequeathed or set aside. The representative acquires title to decedent's personal property, even though it has been specifically bequeathed,¹⁰ or has been set aside for the payment of a particular legacy.¹¹

b. Nature of Title

A personal representative takes title to personality only as trustee for the benefit of distributees and creditors, and acquires only such title as the decedent had;

but his title is exclusive and carries with it the right to dispose of the property.

A personal representative acquires his title to personality of deceased by operation of law.¹² His interest in the property is the same as that owned by decedent at the time of his death, and is subject to all valid liens and encumbrances which then existed.¹³

It has been held that the representative takes an unqualified title to all personality not specifically bequeathed,¹⁴ and that his title and authority as to personal property is exclusive, for the time being, as against creditors, legatees, and all others beneficially interested in the estate.¹⁵ Nevertheless, the representative, as such, takes title only for the purpose of administration, payment of claims,¹⁶ and

Absence of debts

(1) Where the personal property left by the intestate is disposed of by the sole heir and distributee, and there are no debts to be proved against the estate, an administrator subsequently appointed on the petition of such sole distributee cannot recover the property so disposed of.—Cooper v. Hayward, 74 N.W. 152, 71 Minn. 374, 70 Am.S.R. 330.

(2) Where a testatrix bequeathed all of her personal estate to testamentary trustees to hold, invest, and reinvest the principal, and to receive, hold, and disburse the income for the purposes mentioned in the will, and no special power or authority was given to the executor, it was held that the title to the property bequeathed to the trustees, it not being necessary to pay debts, vested in them immediately on testatrix's death, the executor being authorized only to possess himself of such property and deliver it to the trustees.—Matter of Ryer, 88 N.Y.S. 52, 94 App. Div. 449, affirmed 72 N.E. 1150, 180 N.Y. 532.

title to the testator's personality as executors is superior to, and takes precedence over, their title as trustees.²⁵

c. When Title Vests; Relation Back

According to some authorities, a representative acquires title to personality at the time of the decedent's death; according to others, the title remains in abeyance until the representative's appointment, although the title he then acquires relates back to the time of death.

It is frequently asserted that the title to the personal property of decedent vests in his personal representative,²⁶ whether executor²⁷ or administrator,²⁸ at the time of decedent's death. On the other hand, there is authority to the effect that title vests in a personal representative on his appointment, or when his letters are granted,²⁹ and that until such time it remains in abeyance.³⁰ However, in any event, the title of the representative relates back to the death of decedent,³¹ although it does not render the intervening possession of the heirs wrongful.³²

d. Duration and Termination of Title

The representative retains title to personality until the estate is settled, unless he chooses, or is forced, to part with it earlier.

The title to the personal property remains in the personal representative until administration is completed and the estate is fully settled or distributed,³³ unless he chooses,³⁴ or is forced,³⁵ to part with it earlier.

§ 300. Possession and Use

The personal representative is generally entitled to the exclusive possession of the personality of the estate for the purposes, and during the course, of administration. His possession is deemed that of the court.

In the absence of testamentary provision to the contrary,³⁶ the personal representative has the right to the possession, control, and use of the personal estate of decedent, whether testate or intestate,³⁷ for the purposes of administration.³⁸ As a general rule, the representative is entitled to possession and control as against, or to the exclusion of, the widow, next of kin, legatees, or creditors,³⁹ but there are exceptions to this rule,⁴⁰ as, for example, where all debts have been paid and the heirs or other parties beneficially entitled to the personal property are in proper possession thereof,⁴¹ in which case the naked legal title of the representative has been held not to entitle him to possession as against such persons.⁴²

The mere possession of personal property, not wholly wrongful, by decedent at the time of his death under a claim of title may give his executor or administrator a right of possession,⁴³ but ordinarily the representative's right of possession extends only to such personality as belonged to decedent.⁴⁴

The possession of personal property by an executor or administrator is the possession of the court,⁴⁵

Duration of right. The right to the possession of the personalty of decedent vests in the personal representative from the time of his appointment and qualification,⁴⁹ but, by relation back, is considered to have arisen as of the date of decedent's death.⁵⁰ The right continues for the duration of the administration, and until the estate is settled, or until distribution is ordered or made.⁵¹

§ 301. Rights and Duties as to Pledged or Mortgaged Property

A personal representative is bound by a pledge or mortgage of personalty by which deceased was bound; and except as statutes may otherwise provide, the pledgee or mortgagee may enforce his right to possession. The representative should redeem the property if it is of greater value than the indebtedness.

A personal representative acquires the interest held by his decedent in pledged or mortgaged personalty.⁵² Contracts of pledge or mortgage which bound decedent will also bind his executor or administrator,⁵³ at least to the extent of available assets in his hands;⁵⁴ and the pledgee's or mortgagee's rights on default must be respected by him.⁵⁵ Thus, as a general rule, a personal representative must respect the mortgagee's right, in the event of a default under the mortgage, to take possession of the property⁵⁶ or to proceed by summary foreclo-

A bank which treated a debt to it as extinguished and charged it off its books as loss had no further right to retain collateral pledged to it by deceased.—Studer v. Harlan, 109 S.W. 2d 687, 233 Mo.App. 811.

Collateral held by decedent's creditor to secure debt belonged to decedent's estate, but was subject to creditor's right to hold and use it to secure payment of debt.—Reiley v. Healey, 187 A. 661, 122 Conn. 64.

Debt secured by personalty and realty

The representative cannot compel a bank which holds securities and also a mortgage on land as security for a debt of decedent to first exhaust its remedies against the land; and this is true, notwithstanding a contention that the bank could thereby avoid the effect of a statute providing for a moratorium with respect to mortgages on realty.—In re Vicinus' Estate, 290 N.Y.S. 20, 159 Misc. 903.

Proving insolvency to contest validity

Under statute providing that assets of insolvent estate shall be distributed ratably among creditors, executor of mortgagor must plead and prove insolvency of estate to be entitled to contest validity of mortgage.—Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia v. Welch, 192 A. 431, 122 N.J.Eq. 90.

A personal representative cannot, for the benefit of heirs, attack a pledge or mortgage, valid as between the parties, on the ground of failure to comply with statutes intended for the protection of creditors or third persons.⁶⁰ Thus, he cannot, for the benefit of heirs, attack the validity of a chattel mortgage on the ground that it has not been properly filed or renewed;⁶¹ nor can he, for the benefit of heirs, attack a pledge under a statute rendering a pledge agreement in which the amount of the debt is not stated unenforceable as against third persons.⁶² It has been held that where the estate is insolvent the representative can, on behalf of creditors, attack the validity of a chattel mortgage on the ground of the mortgagee's failure to comply with statutory provisions respecting filing;⁶³ but there is also authority to the contrary.⁶⁴

On a sale of pledged personalty at the instance of the pledgee, the representative should endeavor to have the best possible price secured.⁶⁵ In the absence of fraud, undue influence, or similar circumstance, the personal representative of a deceased mortgagor can agree with the mortgagee to have the mortgaged personalty sold without foreclosure, the proceeds to be applied on the debt.⁶⁶

Redemption; preservation of rights. It is the right and duty of the personal representative to employ funds of the estate in redeeming pledged or mortgaged personalty of the estate having a greater value than the secured indebtedness.⁶⁷ In this connection it is necessary, but sufficient, for the representative to act in good faith, and to exercise reasonable prudence and sound discretion.⁶⁸

It is not the duty of an executor or administrator

§ 302. Contracts of Decedent

The rights and duties of an executor or administrator as to the performance of decedent's obligations generally are considered supra § 189, and as to his contracts of pledge or mortgage, supra § 301.

§ 303. Mortgage or Pledge by Representative

Generally, an executor or administrator can pledge or mortgage personalty for administration purposes, although a court order may be required. A pledgee or mortgagee who knew, or should have known, that the pledge or mortgage was not for a just purpose of administration cannot hold the property against the beneficiaries.

While there is authority to the contrary,⁷¹ it is usually considered that, in the absence of any statutory or testamentary provision to the contrary, an executor or administrator has power to raise money by pledge or mortgage of the personalty in his hands, in order to pay the debts or fulfill other purposes of administration.⁷² The pledgee or mortgagee acquires good title as such where he acts in good faith,⁷³ even though the representative is guilty of a breach of trust in connection with the transaction;⁷⁴ but where the pledgee or mortgagee knew, or should have known, that the loan was not for any just purpose of administration, he becomes a participant in the wrong and cannot hold the pledged or mortgaged property against the beneficiaries,⁷⁵ although his possession will generally hold good as against the representative.⁷⁶ A personal representative cannot encumber estate assets to secure his individual debt,⁷⁷ and the fact that the mortgage or pledge was given to secure an individual debt of the executor or administrator establishes the wrongful character of the transaction, and

Acts without advice or approval

Fact that representative did not consult persons experienced in business or seek approval of probate court before turning over additional security and paying interest to prevent a sale of pledged personalty, does not of itself establish a breach of duty.—*Reiley v. Preservation of assets

If value of estate asset to be preserved by raising a mortgage is commensurate with expense of preservation, it is duty of administrator to conserve it; he can do all things which prudent men would do in conduct of their own like affairs, and the question of whether the expense is too great is for the representative, and not for the court, to determine.—In re Schmutz' Estate, 288 N. Y.S. 98, 159 Misc. 454.

Preference

Personal representative cannot, in contravention of statute, prefer some creditors over others of the same class by giving them a mortgage on the property of the estate.—Jenkins v. First Nat. Bank, Tex. Civ.App., 101 S.W.2d 345.

Participation in unauthorized pledge

Administrator cannot maintain an action to recover property of his intestate which the latter's friends, without authority, pawned to procure his coffin, if he was a party to the transaction, although not then the administrator, and if the price of the coffin has not been paid; but proof of his mere presence and passive assent is not sufficient to defeat his action.—*Jones' Adm'r v. Order of court. A promissory note or other chose in action has been held to be "property" within the meaning of a statute under which a personal representative cannot pledge or mortgage personal property of the estate without obtaining an order of the court.⁷⁹

Application of proceeds. A pledgee or mortgagee making a loan in good faith, and without notice of any intended misapplication by the personal representative, is not responsible for the application of the proceeds of the loan.⁸⁰

§ 304. Acquisition of Property by Representative

- a. In representative capacity
- b. In individual capacity

a. In Representative Capacity

Ordinarily, a personal representative should not buy additional personalty for the estate; but where he does acquire property in his fiduciary capacity or with estate funds, he holds it as an asset of the estate.

Ordinarily, the duty of a personal representative is to distribute the personalty of the estate and not to buy additional property.⁸¹ He should not purchase claims,⁸² unless they are against decedent and require disposition in order to settle the estate.⁸³

Money received or property acquired by the representative in his fiduciary capacity and in the exercise of his official duties becomes assets of the estate in his hands,⁸⁴ and the same is true of securities taken for debts due decedent or on a sale of decedent's assets.⁸⁵ Whatever profit may have accrued to the representative acting as such, including gains made through compromise or award, belongs rightfully to the estate and should be accounted for.⁸⁶ Property purchased by the representative with the funds of his decedent is the property of the estate held by him in trust for the heirs and distributees.⁸⁷ Where the representative recovers in his own name on a contract made with him personally after the death of his decedent, respecting the estate, or receives money for the use of the estate, he is answerable as representative for the amount.⁸⁸ The personal representative cannot retain for the estate property improperly acquired by him from a third person as a result of wrongful advice given, or advantage taken, by the representative's attorney.⁸⁹

Exchange of property for services

Transaction, whereby administrator and his attorney accepted shares of stock in exchange for claims for services, was forbidden by Idaho statute, prohibiting administrator from purchasing property of estate

chase at an inadequate price is especially improper.⁹¹ He cannot buy out for himself his decedent's share in a partnership,⁹² and a sale indirectly made by him to a corporation in which he is largely interested is, in law, deemed fraudulent, and may be affirmed or disaffirmed at the option of the parties in interest.⁹³ However, an executor is not guilty of any wrong where he purchases at par a note due the estate at a time when the estate is in pressing need of money, and the value of the collateral securing the note is less than the amount due thereon.⁹⁴

An executor who, without authority to carry on a business of his testator, purchases goods for that purpose, obtains title to such goods individually, and they are subject to an execution against him.⁹⁵ Where an intestate died leaving certain real estate subject to notes for the purchase price secured by a trust deed thereon, the purchase of such notes by the administrator constituted a purchase in his individual capacity, and not for the estate.⁹⁶

Taking assignment as security

An assignment by an heir of his interest in the estate to the representative as security for a loan is not improper where no one is injured.—In re Stewart's Estate, 28 P. 2d 642, 145 Or. 460, 91 A.L.R. 818.

Agreement to repurchase stock taken as share

It is not unlawful for an executor to transfer at par, in settlement of a legacy, stock which is worth less than par, and at the same time to agree to repurchase the stock later at an advanced price on his personal account.—Weymouth v. Goodwin, 75 A. 61, 105 Me. 510—24 C.J. p 230 note 85.

Inadequacy of price may be explained by showing that the distributee, with knowledge of the inadequacy, intended, in effect to make a gift, or was obliged to sell without delay and obtained from the representative as much as, or more than, others had offered.—Bettendorf v.

Purchase at judicial or execution sale. A personal representative is at liberty to purchase the goods of his decedent at a judicial or execution sale,⁹⁷ unless he has in some way caused the sale to be made, or is indirectly the vendor thereat.⁹⁸

(2) Acquisition of Interest of Heir or Legatee

An executor or administrator may acquire the interest of a distributee if the transaction is fair and the facts fully disclosed; the burden is on him to show that he has taken no advantage.

While an executor or administrator may, if the transaction is fair and the consideration adequate, purchase or acquire all or part of the interest of a legatee or distributee,⁹⁹ such a transaction should be closely scrutinized,¹ for the relation of the parties makes such a dealing suspicious and imposes on the representative the burden of showing that no advantage has been taken by him.² It is the duty of the representative to disclose the facts fully and fairly to the heir,³ and if the transaction is tainted Bettendorf, 179 N.W. 444, 945, 190 Iowa 83.

Presumption of purchase

A presumption that the representative purchased from the legatees may arise where he retains property which belonged to the estate, claiming it as his own, for a considerable time after the close of the administration.—Cole v. Collett, Litt. Sel.Cas., Ky., 47.

24 C.J. p 230 note 79.

Presumption of fraud

An executor or administrator, in dealing with those interested in the estate, is regarded as a trustee, and a presumption of fraud or undue influence arises against him when he undertakes to purchase the trust property from his cestuis.—Bettendorf v. Bettendorf, supra.

Effect of independent advice

The fact that a party interested in an estate obtained independent advice before selling her share of the estate to the administrator does not alone obviate the presumption of undue influence; and the presumption is not rebutted if the independent adviser has been misled by the administrator, or is so situated as to the administrator as not to be impartial.—Bettendorf v. Bettendorf, supra.

3. Iowa.—Milroy v. Milroy, 181 N.W. 473, 190 Iowa 1215—Bettendorf v. Bettendorf, 179 N.W. 444, 945, 190 Iowa 83.

with fraud or imposition it will not be allowed to stand.⁴ In determining whether a distributee received an adequate price for property sold by him to the personal representative, the value of the property should be ascertained as of the date of the sale;⁵ but subsequent statements by the representative concerning the value of the property can be considered as bearing on the good faith of his previous representations to the distributee at the time of the purchase.⁶

Who may object. Where the personal representative purchases the interest of a particular heir or legatee, only the vendor can object to the transaction, and the other heirs or legatees have no right to object.⁷

Interest. It is proper to charge interest against the representative on the amount recovered against him by reason of his acquisition of property from a distributee at an inadequate price.⁸ Where an administratrix obtained a voidable assignment of certain stocks, she was liable, on the heir's disaffirmance, to account for the value of the stocks, dividends received thereon by her, and interest on the avails of a sale thereof from the time the stocks were sold.⁹

2. SALE

§ 305. Power to Sell and Transfer Title

A representative has absolute power to sell the personal property of a decedent's estate as he sees fit, except where it is required by statute that he first obtain the sanction of the court; and authorities differ as to whether violation of the statute invalidates the sale. Where the power of sale is conferred by will, a court order may not be necessary.

Under the common-law rule, and in the absence of any statute providing otherwise, an executor or administrator has the absolute power to sell or dispose of the personal assets of the estate as he sees fit and can pass good title to a purchaser;¹⁰ and the courts of one state will presume that the common-law rule prevails in another state in the absence of any showing that it has been changed by statute.¹¹ It has been held that, where it does not appear that the sale is necessary for the payment of debts or legacies, and is not made so by the terms of the will, the beneficiaries may elect to take the property in specie.¹²

However, in many jurisdictions, under statutes to that effect, an executor or administrator is required to obtain the sanction of the court before the representative can sell or otherwise dispose of the personalty.¹³ Some of the statutory provisions as to

Trust company, as administrator, and the president of the company, occupied such a confidential relation with heirs that neither could acquire, by gift or purchase from the heirs, any property belonging to the estate of deceased, except under the most perfect understanding by the heirs of their rights and by their entirely free and voluntary act.—Walsh v. Walsh, 226 S.W. 236, 285 Mo. 181.

Distributee does not ratify the representative's fraudulent purchase of property by a purported settlement made at a time when the distributee is as ignorant of the true facts as at the time of the sale.—Bettendorf v. Bettendorf, 179 N.W. 444, 945, 190 Iowa 83.

the sale of personalty have been considered to be merely directory and for the protection of the representative, and not to affect his jus disponendi and power to pass a good title,¹⁴ but it has also been held that a sale without an order of court is absolutely void and passes no title to the purchaser.¹⁵ Under statute to that effect, personal property may be sold at public sale without an order of the court where necessary to pay debts or legacies.¹⁶

Sales pursuant to court order are considered in §§ 536-666 infra.

Advice of court. Provision may be made by statute for the securing of the direction and advice of the surrogate as to the sale of personalty. Applications under such a statute, it has been held, should not be favored.¹⁷ However, unusual circumstances may be present which will warrant the surrogate in disposing of the matter.¹⁸

Effect of testamentary provisions. A power of sale may be conferred on an executor by the will, in which event he acts in making the sale by virtue of the power so conferred, and not by virtue of his common-law power or pursuant to any authority derived from the probate court.¹⁹ As a gen-

Contract held not sale

If agreement between deceased's widow and administrator of deceased's estate provided that widow was to substitute herself for deceased as guarantor of obligation of a company, and that for her undertaking widow was to receive practically all assets of estate of any value, as contended, by widow, agreement did not amount to a "sale," and administrator had no authority to enter into such contract by virtue of provision in will authorizing administrator to sell.—Fry v. Bryant, 103 P.2d 760, 165 Or. 61.

Particular testamentary provisions

(1) Where testator, after specific bequests, directed executor to sell all property and to divide proceeds among certain legatees, he intended

eral rule statutes requiring an order of court to authorize a sale of personalty do not apply in cases where the testator has by his will authorized the executor to sell expressly,²⁰ or by necessary implication;²¹ but it has also been held that if the testator desires the power to be exercised without such order it should be so expressed in the will and otherwise an order is necessary.²²

Restrictions may also be imposed by the will on the executor with reference to the sale of the testator's personalty,²³ although an executor may sometimes be justified in selling, notwithstanding the sale is in opposition to a direction of the will.²⁴ The fact that a chattel is specifically bequeathed does not deprive an executor of the power to sell or dispose of it,²⁵ at least if he has not assented to the legacy;²⁶ but such a disposition constitutes a breach of duty, except where the general personal assets are insufficient.²⁷

Representative appointed by foreign court. On principles of comity and state policy, the courts of one state will not interfere with the power of the representative of an estate appointed by the court of another state to sell the property of deceased in the absence of a showing that irreparable injury would result.²⁸

Power as dependent on office. The authority to sell can be exercised only while the personal representative is in office, because his title to the assets is divested as soon as he ceases to be executor or administrator,²⁹ but a sale while in office is not invalidated by the subsequent removal, resignation, or discharge of the representative.³⁰ Where a person named as executor did not qualify by giving to include everything not previously effectually disposed of.

Gregory, 165 N.E. 208, 333 Ill. 643.

(3) Right given executors, under will bequeathing life estate in real property, to sell products of land and to pay a legacy out of the proceeds of such sale, was held not destroyed by the subsequent merger of the life estate and the remainder.—Shull v. Rigby, 144 S.E. 372, 196 N.C. 4.

(4) Provision of will directing executors to dispose of personal property within one year after testator's death had reference to tangible property instead of intangible property such as notes.—Diebold v. Diebold, App., 141 S.W.2d 119, transferred, see, Mo., 133 S.W.2d 401.

(5) Will directing executors to divide securities in residue was held to contemplate division on notice to and consent of all residuary legatees, and transfer to coexecutor without knowledge of others was unauthorized.—In re Boyle's Estate, 230 N.Y.S. 392, 128 Misc. 639.

legatees.—In re Youngblood's Estate, 178 A. 517, 117 Pa.Super. 550.

Sale and replenishment of stock in trade

Where an executor, with power of sale by the will, sells part of a stock in trade in the course of continuing the business and purchases new stock with the proceeds of such sale, the new stock remains in the estate, since such sale and replenishment are not a disposition of the property within the terms of the will.—Vincent v. bond as required by statute, a sale by him is void as against an executor who did qualify.³¹

Annual crops. Although the law may require the representative to obtain authority from the court to sell the personalty, yet, in the case of annual crops, if he is unable to obtain the order from the court in time to prevent loss and he makes a sale, the maxim, Lex non cogit ad impossibilia, is applicable,³² and annual crops are sometimes expressly excepted from the operation of a statute requiring an order of court to authorize a sale.³³ The administrator has authority to sell sufficient of the annual crops to reimburse one who has made advances to him to aid in putting in the crops on the estate.³⁴

Perishable property. Under statute to that effect, a representative may, with the approval of the court, sell perishable goods for the purpose of conserving and protecting the assets of the estate,³⁵ and, under statute to that effect, it has been held that perishable property may be sold without an order of court at public sale.³⁶ As a general rule when perishable property is given by a will to one for life with remainder to another, it is the duty of the executor to sell the property and invest the fund, only the interest on which would belong to the person having the life estate; but if the will indicates an intention that the life tenant shall enjoy the property in specie it should not be sold.³⁷

Particular property. Various particular kinds of personal property have been held to be³⁸ or not to be³⁹ within the representative's power to sell under the general rules hereinbefore stated.

tion should be collected, rather than sold, circumstances may render a sale, even at a discount, beneficial to the estate; and of the existence of such circumstances the executor or administrator is to judge in the exercise of the discretion committed to him.⁴¹

Statutes requiring sales of personalty to be under order of court have been held in some cases to apply only to tangible personalty, and not to affect the representative's power to dispose of choses in action,⁴² but the more generally accepted view is that such statutes are not so restricted but apply to choses in action as well as tangible personalty;⁴³ and, in order that an assignment of a claim be valid, evidence of such authority must appear.⁴⁴

Transfers in satisfaction of debts. Transfers of choses in action in satisfaction of decedent's debts may be made by an executor or administrator,⁴⁵ but the personal representative has no right to make such a transfer to the prejudice of other creditors of the estate,⁴⁶ although it will be sustained as between himself and the transferee.⁴⁷ However, a transfer of a chose in action in satisfaction of an individual debt of the representative is unauthorized.⁴⁸

A provision of a will directing the executor to dispose of personal property has been held to refer only to tangible property and not to authorize a sale of intangible property.⁴⁹

Foreign debts. While the more generally accepted view is that an executor or administrator may assign a claim against a nonresident of the state in which he was appointed and is acting so as to authorize the assignee to sue the debtor in the courts of the latter's domicile,⁵⁰ the right of the representative to make such an assignment has also been denied, apparently on the view that to give effect to such assignment would extend the representative's authority beyond the state in which he was appointed, and amount to an administration in another state, to the possible detriment of resident creditors.⁵¹

Effect of assignment. An authorized assignment of a claim by the executor or administrator of the claimant enables the assignee to sue on the claim anywhere.⁵² Where an executor or administrator having the power to do so assigns a chose in action, the only remedy of the distributees is on the representative's bond.⁵³ Where an administratrix was fraudulently induced to assign a policy on her

Assignment of insurance policy held proper

Where executrix of estate of deceased beneficiary, who had absolute ownership in life policies, assigned the policies to insured who promised to pay to beneficiary's estate amount of dividends which had been applied to policies to keep them in force, provided insured should keep policies in force for period of one year, assignments were supported by consideration, even if insured, who kept policies in force for required period, would not have been required to pay the amount of the dividends to the beneficiary's estate if insured had not kept the assigned policies in force; nor were assignments void on ground of trust relationship between the parties, where there was no evidence of fraud, collusion or bad faith, and evidence indicated that executrix exercised good judgment in making the assignments and that they were for the benefit of the estate.—Equitable Life Assur. Soc. of U. S. v. Mallers, C.C.A.Ill., 104 F.2d 567.

Sale of mortgage held proper

It was not incumbent on executor to foreclose mortgages owned by testatrix and purchase mortgaged realty, and his failure to do so did not indicate failure to exercise sound business judgment or lack of prudence, where he tried to sell them in ordinary course of business for nearly year before advertisement of public sale; and sale, regularly advertised, well attended and fairly conducted, in customary manner after competitive bidding, for amount not shown to be less than would have been realized on foreclosure sale, was within executor's judgment and discretion.—In re Martin's Estate, 4 A.2d 551, 135 Pa.Super. 136.

intestate's life, and the assignee transferred it to another who had knowledge of the fraud, but who did not know that the transfer was made without an order of court, the ultimate transferee did not acquire title to the property.⁵⁴

Construction of assignment. Rules governing the construction of contracts generally have been held to apply to assignments of choses in action.⁵⁵

b. Commercial Paper

Except in so far as the power may be limited by statutes requiring court authorization, a representative has the power to transfer and indorse commercial paper payable to the decedent. His indorsement carries with it the same burden as any other indorsement for value.

According to the common-law rule it is within the power of an executor or administrator to indorse over and transfer commercial paper payable to his decedent,⁵⁶ and it necessarily follows from this that he may transfer such paper when it is payable to himself in his representative capacity.⁵⁷ In some jurisdictions the representative is held to have power to transfer negotiable paper without an order of court authorizing him to do so, although the statute requires an order of court to authorize the transfer of personalty, it being considered that such statutes do not apply to negotiable instruments,⁵⁸ and that such transfers are valid at least as to strangers and parties not interested;⁵⁹ but in other jurisdictions such statutes are held to include negotiable instruments.⁶⁰ In some jurisdictions the power of the executor or administrator to transfer notes is limited to certain specific cases.⁶¹

In those states where the administrator has power to indorse and assign notes due decedent it will be presumed that an administrator in another state has the same power,⁶² unless it is alleged or shown that the administrator's power is regulated or restricted by statute of that state;⁶³ and in a state where the administrator must be authorized by order of court before he can assign a note, it has been presumed that the law of a foreign country is the same.⁶⁴

Effect of transfer or indorsement. The executor's indorsement of a note carries with it the same burden as that of any other indorsement for value.⁶⁵ A "without recourse" indorsement transfers title but negatives all personal liability on the part of the representative.⁶⁶

55. Against party causing uncertainty

Language of ambiguous assignment should be interpreted most strongly against party who caused uncertainty to exist; and, so construed, assignment imputed intention to transfer only individual interests of administratrix and daughter, and finding that sale from estate was intended, was held unsupported. Discounting

A legal representative may discount the notes of an estate if the exigencies of the estate make it advisable to do so.—Felton v. Felton, 195 S.E. 533, 213 N.C. 194.

Maker could not prevent payee's administrator from exercising right to assign notes to third person.—Carter v. Piercy, 159 S.E. 154, 156 Va. 640.

Indorsement held proper

Executors of decedent's estate were empowered, with court's approval, to create liability against estate by indorsement of note and mortgage transferred to plaintiff.—University State Bank v. Johnson, 210 N.W. 785, 202 Iowa 654.

Sale of notes held authorized

In mortgagors' action to cancel notes secured by deed of trust, facts were held to show that sale of notes to defendant by deceased holder's administratrix was authorized by probate court.—Webb v. Salisbury, 39 S.W.2d 1045, 327 Mo. 1123.

Subsequent approval

Payee indorsers of notes were liable to purchaser, notwithstanding administrator of joint payee was not expressly authorized to indorse notes by Louisiana court which had jurisdiction of administration of estate, where purchaser paid payee's interest in proceeds of notes to payee's heirs who assigned to purchaser their interest in notes and sale of notes, and disbursement of proceeds was approved by administration court, especially where neither such court nor payee's heirs had repudiated administrator's indorsement.—Weston v. the deceased maker, after the obligation had been extinguished by its return to the representative, has been held to amount to a new obligation by such representative individually, even though he undertook to bind the estate.⁶⁷

§ 307. — Stocks, Bonds, and Mortgages

Subject to statutory limitations or requirements, a representative has the power to transfer stocks and bonds and mortgages, which belonged to the decedent.

At common law the executor or administrator has power to transfer stocks and bonds which belonged to his decedent at the time of his death.⁶⁸ However, under statutes to that effect, the representative must first obtain a court order authorizing such sale.⁶⁹ Such statutes have been held to be mandatory,⁷⁰ so as to render a sale in violation thereof invalid.⁷¹

An executor may have the power to sell corporate stock under the provisions of a will to that effect;⁷² and it has been held that the power so granted supercedes the statutory requirement that a court order be obtained,⁷³ provided, however, the will expressly authorizes a sale without court order.⁷⁴

Administrator's personal advantage

Administrator, who before sale of stock held legal title thereto and had absolute control thereof as property of estate, was authorized to sell shares, notwithstanding finding in decree for removal of administrator that such sale was for administrator's personal advantage.—Comstock v. Bowles, 3 N.E.2d 817, 295 Mass. 250.

Bank stock

(1) The statute providing that no transfer of stock shall be valid against a bank so long as the registered holder thereof is indebted to the bank does not affect the right or duty of the administrator to sell bank stock listed in the inventory, but only requires that any liability of the transferor to the bank be paid before an absolute title can be given to the purchaser.—In re Park's Estate, 75 P.2d 842, 147 Kan. 142.

(2) At any time before decree of distribution, administrators of an estate had authority to effect a sale of personalty, and short of knowledge or notice of a wrongful purpose, a bank's predecessor was in no position to question a request by administrators for transfer of stock made on presentation of a properly endorsed certificate, and without such knowledge, no liability could attach to bank for a transfer so made.—Aronson v. Bank of America N. T. & S. A., 109 P.2d 1001, 42 Cal. App.2d 710.

Direction in letters of administration

Direction, contained in letters of administration appointing special administrator, that he might close out margin account which deceased had with brokerage company, was held not broad enough to authorize sale of deceased's stock in absence of proof that stock was about to depreciate and of filing of petition for order to sell, and hence brokerage company was justified in refusing to accept letters as authority to sell stock.—Off v. Russell, 60 P.2d 331, 16 Cal.App.3d 337.

Liberal construction of statute

Statute requiring the consent of the court or judge to a sale by an executor of dividend-paying stock was manifestly intended for the better protection of property rights, and is therefore remedial and to be liberally construed to effectuate the legislative purpose.—Barth v. Fidelity & Columbia Trust Co., 224 S.W. 351, 188 Ky. 788.

Payment of debts and legacies

However, under statute authorizing executor to sell personalty other than perishable goods for the purpose of paying debts and legacies, executor was authorized to sell securities to pay legacies without order of court.—In re Flynn's Estate, Mo.App., 142 S.W.2d 1069.

Effect on representative's discretion

Statute transfers from the executor to the court or judge the discretion to determine the propriety of selling the stock.—Barth v. Fidelity & Columbia Trust Co., 224 S.W. 351, 188 Ky. 788.

Estoppel; warranty of title

Transfer of stock by executrix in her representative capacity by indorsement thereof, without court order, did not give subsequent transferee title under doctrine of estoppel as against executrix personally, where executrix was not asserting individual right to stock as legatee; nor was she liable personally as for breach of warrant of authority, in absence of proof of reliance on representation that court authority had been obtained; moreover, estoppel cannot be asserted against her as executrix since personal representative has no power to give warranty of title; nor can subsequent transferee claim as bona fide purchaser since certificate disclosed attempted transfer by executrix without any showing of authority.—Merchants' Bank v. People's Savings & Loan Ass'n, C.C.A.Okl., 70 F.2d 161, 93 A.L.R. 226.

Knowledge imputed to purchaser

Corporation repurchasing stock from deceased stockholder's executor at private sale was held bound to know that executor could not make valid sale without court order.—Interstate Public Service Co. v. Weiss, 193 N.E. 226, 208 Ind. 122.

Repurchase by corporation pursuant to agreement

Where corporation, when selling stock to stockholder, gave him option to return stock at any time at certain price, and stockholder's executor, pursuant to the agreement, surrendered stock for cancellation and received the money without having obtained court order, transaction between executor and corporation was "sale" of stock within statute forbidding such sale without court's direction, so that sale was in valid and corporation was required to account to estate for the stock where executor allegedly did not account for proceeds.—Interstate Public Service Co. v. Weiss, 193 N.E. 226, 208 Ind. 122.

72. "Property"

Share of stock in a railroad company is embraced in the term "property," directed by a will to be sold.—Adams v. Jones, 59 N.C. 221, 224.

"Securities"

Term "securities," as used in will authorizing executors to sell whatever securities were necessary to pay expenses, referred to shares of corporate stock.—In re Westfield Trust Co., 176 A. 101, 117 N.J.Eq. 429, reversing 172 A. 212, 115 N.J.Eq. 61.

⁷⁴ Md.—Goldsborough v. De Wit, 189 A. 226, 171 Md. 225.

Where a transfer is to be made, it may be made in the representative's own name,⁷⁵ and such an assignment carries with it a cause of action for the conversion of stock.⁷⁶ In the absence of ancillary administration or statutory prohibition the domiciliary administrator duly appointed has authority to sell and assign the stock of decedent in a foreign corporation.⁷⁷

In determining when and what securities to sell, an executor should act in good faith and with the same degree of care as a reasonable and ordinarily prudent man in a similar situation; and when he so acts he is not an insurer of the results and is not responsible for losses.⁷⁸

Mortgages. As a general rule the authority of the executor or administrator of a mortgagee, extends to an assignment of the mortgage,⁷⁹ although it is sometimes required under statutes so providing that an order of court to that effect be procured in order to warrant such an assignment.⁸⁰ A purported assignment of a mortgage by the widow of a deceased member of a partnership as executrix before the partnership affairs have been settled is invalid.⁸¹ Where an interested party had consented to the transfer by the representative of mortgages belonging to the estate, such party would be bound by such transfer.⁸²

§ 308. Duty to Sell

A representative is not under a duty to sell non-perishable property except where a will so directs, or it is necessary to pay debts or legacies or to make distribution.

Executors and administrators are not required to sell nonperishable property unless the will so directs, or unless a sale is necessary to pay debts or legacies.⁸³ However, except where the parties desire that distribution be made in specie,⁸⁴ it is the duty of the representative to convert the assets of the estate in order that distribution may be made.⁸⁵ Moreover, an executor or an administrator with the will annexed is under a duty to sell property where he is so directed by the provisions of the will.⁸⁶

The duty of the representative to sell property in order to avoid depreciation of the assets of the estate, and his liability for loss resulting from his failure to sell, or delay in selling, the property, are considered supra § 248.

Corporate stock

Ordinarily the representative of an estate is charged with the responsibility of converting the personality of a decedent into cash and making proper distribution thereof, although corporate stock is not usually sold, but is distributed and transferred in kind, under direction of the court.—State ex rel. Department of Financial Institutions v. Kaufman, Ind., 30 N.E.2d. 978.

Government bonds

It was unnecessary for administrator to procure court order to sell government bonds belonging to deceased when they were susceptible of distribution in kind.—Maynard v. Maynard's Admr., 64 S.W.2d 567, 251 Ky. 246, 91 A.L.R. 697.

Executors granted discretion

A power of sale given by will to executors and provisions directing executors to retain securities owned by testator if reasonably safe, were not inconsistent and gave executors power to retain or sell in their sound discretion.—In re Herb's Estate, 296 N.Y.S. 491, 163 Misc. 441.

§ 309. Time for Sale

Subject to testamentary provision or court order otherwise, a representative should sell the personalty, where a sale is proper, within a reasonable time; but he may properly respect the wishes of the beneficiaries. Under statutes to that effect a sale must be held within a limited time from the granting of letters.

So far as an executor or administrator may be bound to sell and dispose of personalty, he should proceed to do so within a reasonable time,⁸⁷ except in so far as the rule may be affected by testamentary provisions⁸⁸ or court orders.⁸⁹ However, notwithstanding the duty of the representative to sell property at a particular time, it has been held proper for him to respect the wishes of the beneficiaries with respect to the time of sale.⁹⁰ In any event the representative should not attempt to sell the personalty before probate of the will and the issuance of letters testamentary;⁹¹ and under a provision that the representative must discharge the specific legacies after the expiration of one year it has been held that a sale of the property within the year is improper even with the consent of the legatees.⁹²

In some jurisdictions, under statutes so providing or construed, sales must ordinarily be held within a specified period from the granting of letters;⁹³ but where special circumstances have intervened which make the sale impractical at the indicated time the court may allow a reasonable extension,⁹⁴ or, where no prejudice is done, waive a past compliance.⁹⁵ The beneficiaries may, by laches, lose the right to object to an order allowing an extension, where they fail to make the objection within a reasonable time after notice of such order.⁹⁶

Sale as of what date. Under an express provision to that effect in the will, a sale was held to be effective as of the date of the testator's death, and all acts relating to the sale similarly related back to that date.⁹⁷

§ 310. Manner and Conduct of Sale

In the absence of statute the representative may sell the personalty of the estate at public or private sale, as he

As expeditiously as possible

Ordinarily a representative should convert his decedent's personal property into cash as expeditiously as possible, although this rule varies with the circumstances of the case.—In re Stephen's Estate, 181 A. 559, 320 Pa. 97.

Sale on qualifying

It has been held a proper performance of his duty for the representative to sell the property at its inventory value immediately on qualifying.—In re McLean's Estate, 4 A. 2d 318, 333 Pa. 293.

Sale at advanced prices

It is executrix' duty to administer estate and make every effort to liquidate assets remaining in her hands as speedily as good business indicates, and effort should be made to dispose of securities retained by her at advanced prices, if such opportunity presents itself in near future.—In re Easton's Estate, 13 N. Y.S.2d 295.

Eighteen years

Effect of statute as to bank stock

Under statute requiring the administrator to sell the whole of the personal property within three months, and statute providing that transfer of bank stock shall not be valid until indebtedness due bank is paid, administrator of estate of one owing debt to bank, which debt was due and unpaid, had duty to sell the stock which deceased held in the bank, subject to bank's lien.—In re Park's Estate, 75 P.2d 842, 147 Kan. 142.

deems best; but under statute to that effect the sale must be public unless a private sale is authorized by the court or the will.

Statutory provisions, if any, as to the procedure for sale of personal property must be at least substantially complied with.⁹⁸ While it has been held that an executor or administrator should normally sell the property of the estate by a public sale, after notice to the parties interested, and adequate advertisement, according to the circumstances,⁹⁹ it is the rule at common law that the manner of sale is a matter resting in the discretion of the personal representative,¹ who may sell at either private or public sale as he may deem best.² However, if he sells it at private sale he is subjected to a higher degree of care and attention than if the property is sold at public sale.³ An executor, under a general power of sale in the will, may sell either by public or private sale.⁴ A testamentary direction that certain paintings owned by the testator and of which a sale is directed "are to be taken to Europe to be recognized by art authorities" in order that the highest price be obtained for them has been held to be directory merely.⁵ As to funds within the jurisdiction and control of the court, the representative is required to follow the orders of the court in disposing of the fund.⁶

In some states, under statutes to that effect, the property must be sold by public or auction sale, unless the court has specially authorized a private sale;⁷ and while some authorities have held that such a statute is merely directory, so that a bona fide private sale is nevertheless valid,⁸ others have held that a private sale in violation of the statute is void and conveys no title to the purchaser.⁹ However, despite such a statute, an executor may sell the property at private sale where the will so provides;¹⁰ and the statute does not control a discretion given to executors by the will with respect to the manner of sale.¹¹

Ordinarily rules governing the conduct of public sales must be complied with;¹² but it has been held that a representative acting in good faith is not liable for mistake of law or for error in judgment in connection with the sale.¹³ The fact that property is to be sold at private sale does not prevent advertisement of the sale and notice to the public so that the property is brought more properly into the market.¹⁴

§ 311. By Whom Sale Made

In general the sale must be made by the representative; but he may employ an agent or auctioneer.

As a general rule the sale is to be made by the executor or administrator,¹⁵ and if the will directs that property shall be sold, without naming the person to sell, the executor is the proper person to carry out the directions.¹⁶ While an executor cannot delegate to another the execution of a special power of sale committed to him by the will in personal trust and confidence,¹⁷ neither an executor nor an administrator is required to act personally, but he may employ an agent or auctioneer to sell.¹⁸ In case of such employment, however, the sale is still the representative's own act, and he is responsible for the negligence or defalcation of the agent, unless he used due and proper care in making the selection.¹⁹

§ 312. Price, Terms, and Conditions

A representative should realize the best price obtainable, but he will not be liable for obtaining less where he acted in good faith and with prudence. He may ordinarily sell for reasonable credit; and must take good security for the deferred payments. His liability in connection with the security depends on whether he acts in good faith and with prudence.

It is the duty of an executor or administrator to realize the best price obtainable for the property;²⁰ and if he fails in this duty he is personally liable to the persons interested in the estate for the difference between the amount received and the amount which he could have realized.²¹ While it is sometimes required that the property shall not be sold for less than its appraised value,²² it is generally held that if the representative acts in good faith and with reasonable prudence and diligence he cannot be held liable as for a devastavit upon the theory that he might have sold for a better price than he actually obtained,²³ and it has been held that, in the absence of fraud, if the property is sold at a price not less than the appraised value, the representative's acts cannot be questioned.²⁴

Where the price to be paid for certain property is specified in the will, it is sufficient that the executor sell for that price.²⁵ Where a will authorized a sale of property to the decedent's surviving partners on the inventory value and on an inventory basis, it is immaterial that the inventory value, as determined for such sale, is not the same as the inventory value as stated in transfer tax proceedings.²⁶

It has been held that a statute providing that unless the purchase price of property belonging to a succession is equal to its actual value its sale for less than the amount of its appraisement is void relates only to the first offering, and when the property is readvertised for sale and at a second offering sold on a twelve-months' credit it may be val-

sentative sells for anything but cash, except in rare and exceptional cases, he becomes the guarantor of the result of the transaction, and if it proves unfortunate he may be charged as for a devastavit,²⁷ the more general rule allows him to sell on reasonable credit.²⁸ In some jurisdictions, under statute to that effect, credit for a specified period may be granted;²⁹ but a sale on a longer credit has been held void.³⁰ However, where the terms and conditions are provided for by the will, the provisions of the will are controlling;³¹ and even the statute limiting the period for which credit may be given has been held not to limit the power of a testator to authorize a longer term.³²

Security. Except in so far as the rule may be affected by testamentary provisions,³³ where an executor or administrator may and does sell property on credit he must take good security for the deferred payments;³⁴ and if he fails to take security or takes insufficient security he is liable for any resulting loss.³⁵ As a general rule it is for the executor or administrator to determine the sufficiency of the security, and he is personally liable for any loss occasioned by his negligence or improper conduct with regard thereto,³⁶ but approval by the court is sometimes required.³⁷

If the representative acting in good faith and without negligence takes security which is apparently good and sufficient when taken, he is not liable if a loss subsequently occurs not attributable to his fault or laches;³⁸ but he is liable for any loss due to his lack of diligence in collecting or realizing on the security.³⁹ Insolvency of sureties at the time they were accepted shows prima facie that the personal representative was negligent;⁴⁰ but an executor or administrator who accepts sureties who are at the time sufficient is not chargeable because of their subsequent insolvency,⁴¹ or because an action on the note was successfully defended without fault on his part,⁴² unless the sale was unauthorized and improper,⁴³ or the security was such as he had no right to take.⁴⁴ Although as a general rule an executor or administrator relieves himself of personal liability for the price of goods of the estate sold on credit, where he takes sureties of sufficient financial ability at the time when he accepted them, he cannot relieve himself of liability by taking nonresidents of the state,⁴⁵ or a person who is the purchaser's partner in business;⁴⁶ and there is authority for the view that the personal security afforded by sureties on the note of the purchaser should not be allowed at all.⁴⁷

§ 313. Who May Purchase

As a general rule, which, however, is subject to certain exceptions, anyone may buy the property of the estate from the representative.

Except as appears in this section, and in § 314 infra, the property of an estate offered for sale by an executor or administrator may be purchased by anyone.⁴⁹

Relative of representative. The husband of an executrix or administratrix cannot purchase from her or from her coexecutors or coadministrators without the consent of all the beneficiaries.⁵⁰ It has been held that a public sale of the assets to the son of the executor was not invalid, where a proper notice was given, and the price obtained was the best price bid, and there was no pretense that the purchase in any way operated to the benefit of the executor.⁵¹

§ 314. — Personal Representative

Subject to certain exceptions, as where the beneficiaries consent to or ratify such sale, an executor or administrator may not ordinarily purchase the property of the estate directly or indirectly. Such a sale is voidable by those interested in the estate, and may render the representative personally liable.

Subject to the exceptions hereinafter considered, and in the absence of a testamentary provision authorizing such purchase,⁵² it is well settled that an executor or administrator has no right to purchase the property at a sale thereof, either public or private, whether the sale is made by himself or by his coexecutor or coadministrator.⁵³ However, except where such a sale is declared void by statute,⁵⁴ it is usually considered not void, but only voidable, at the option of those interested in the estate;⁵⁵ and it is valid as to them until it is set aside at their instance.⁵⁶

While it has been held that the representative may become a purchaser at his own sale, if he makes the sale fairly and pays full value,⁵⁷ and that the sale may be allowed to stand where it appears that the price was fair and that the transaction was for the benefit of the estate, and satisfactory to those beneficially interested,⁵⁸ it has also been held that it may be avoided regardless of whether it was made in good or bad faith,⁵⁹ or whether the sale was fair and the price adequate.⁶⁰ Until the sale is set aside the representative holds the title in trust for the beneficiaries of the estate.⁶¹

As to the representative the sale is valid and it cannot be avoided by him,⁶² nor will it be set aside at the instance of persons who have no interest in the estate.⁶³

Pledgor

In proceeding by pledgor to set aside sale of pledged bonds by the administrator of the pledgee to himself, the fact that sale was made shoes of the representative and acquires no greater rights than did the representative.⁶⁴

Purchase from original purchaser. While a purchase by an executor or administrator from a third person who was an actual bidder at the sale, but who was acting in collusion with the executor or administrator, or pursuant to an agreement or understanding with him, is merely an indirect purchase by him at his own sale, and therefore subject to the same infirmity as though he had purchased in the first instance,⁶⁵ the representative may purchase from a purchaser, if the original transaction was in good faith and without collusion;⁶⁶ but the court will look with great jealousy at such a transaction, particularly where the transfer of bids or title takes place very soon after the sale.⁶⁷

Exceptions to rule. The rule forbidding an executor or administrator to purchase property of the estate is subject to several exceptions,⁶⁸ such as that he may purchase with the consent of all the persons interested in the estate,⁶⁹ or where he is himself a beneficiary of the estate,⁷⁰ or that he may take specific property to pay any indebtedness of the estate to himself for advances or otherwise.⁷¹ In some jurisdictions, under statutes to that effect, executors and administrators may, subject to certain restrictions, purchase at sales of their decedents' property.⁷²

Ratification. A sale by an executor or administrator to himself may be ratified by those interested in the estate,⁷³ and there is a ratification where such persons, with knowledge of the facts, acquiesce or fail to object within a reasonable time,⁷⁴ or accept a note given by the personal representative for the purchase money,⁷⁵ or where the representative accounts with them for the price, without any unfairness in the settlement and with knowledge on their part of all the facts.⁷⁶

Liability of representative. The representative who purchases the property of the estate becomes personally liable for the price⁷⁷ or value⁷⁸ thereof, and is chargeable with the amount as cash after the expiration of the term of credit.⁷⁹ It has been held that if the representative purchases at less than the appraised value he will be accountable for the difference,⁸⁰ and also that, if he purchases and resells at a profit, such profit belongs to the estate.⁸¹ An administrator who, having taken property of the estate, crediting it therefor, is personally sued therefor by another is not entitled to a credit, on his accounting, for the amount of the judgment recovered against him.⁸²

In view of probable expenses and delay in finally getting money on them, did not show that sale was colorable or fraudulent or with no intention to change relation of pledgor and pledgee; nor does the fact that purchase money bid at sale of bonds pledged by pledgee's administrator to himself was not paid in, and bonds remained in hands of administrator, invalidate sale as to pledgor.—*Persons v. Repurchase by representative's firm

However, where the executor of the estate of a deceased partner sold to the surviving partner the interest of the estate in the business, and such interest was then acquired by a firm in which such survivor and the executor, individually, had almost the entire interest, and the sale was approved by the county court in proceedings to which the legatees of the deceased partner were not parties, and they did not know of the transaction until long after the term of court had expired, a court of equity had jurisdiction to

§ 315. Conveyance and Transfer

A transfer or conveyance must be made by the representative in his representative capacity. The instrument need not recite his authority to convey except where a court order is required.

A transfer or conveyance of the property of an estate by the legal representative of the estate must be made by him in his representative capacity,⁸³ and a transfer made in his individual capacity is ineffectual to pass title.⁸⁴ If a sale is made under a power given by the will, and is absolute, and possession is delivered by the executor, no bill of sale or other written evidence is necessary to transfer the title to the purchaser.⁸⁵ The purchaser of corporate stock at an executor's sale has the right to demand the identical shares purchased,⁸⁶ but the executor is entitled to a reasonable time after the sale in which to deliver the stock certificate.⁸⁷ The assignment of a bank deposit by delivery of a bank book can be effected only in accordance with the rules of the bank.⁸⁸

Recital of authority. It has been held that, where there is a written conveyance in which the executor neglects to recite his authority to convey, the conveyance will nevertheless be referred to such authority.⁸⁹ However, it has been held that where the authority of the representative is dependent on a court order an assignment or conveyance is of no effect where it does not contain a recital that it was so authorized.⁹⁰

§ 316. Payment or Recovery of Price

In general, only the giving of money constitutes payment. Fraudulent representations in the sale, failure of consideration, and breach of contract have been held to be valid defenses to an action for the purchase money or a ground for action by the purchaser against the representative.

In general, only the giving of money can constitute payment for property purchased at a sale by a representative.⁹¹ Thus the giving of a note is not a payment therefor;⁹² nor is an executor or administrator authorized to receive other property in payment for property sold by him.⁹³ The purchaser may by agreement with the representative discharge his note given for the purchase money by applying the amount to the payment of the creditors of the estate,⁹⁴ but he cannot set off a debt due him from decedent against the purchase money,⁹⁵ at least where the assets are exhausted by claims having precedence in law.⁹⁶ Where an executor sold tobacco, made on his testator's estate, and collected a part only of the money, the residue belonged to the devisees who might pursue the debtors without recourse to the executor.⁹⁷ It is presumed, after the lapse of a proper time for collecting the purchase money, that the representative has collected it.⁹⁸ Where the representative sells through an agent, partly for cash and partly on credit, and the purchasers make a cash payment to the agent, he receives it to the use of the representative.⁹⁹

Grounds for nonpayment or recovery of price. Among the various matters which it has been held the purchaser may set up by way of defense to an action for the purchase money or by way of an action by the purchaser against the representative are fraudulent representations in the sale,¹ failure of

(3) Where a sale was made with reference to Confederate money, and after the close of the war the executors settled with the purchaser at one tenth of the price bid, such settlement being made in good faith and the amount realized being more than the value of the Confederate currency at the date of the purchase, the executors were accountable only for the amount actually received.—Smith v. Prothro, 2 S.C. 371.

consideration,² and breach of contract.³ The purchaser, on discovering any irregularity or defect which justifies him either in rescinding the sale or in claiming damages, should act promptly and so far as possible on his part seek to place the representative and estate in statu quo;⁴ but, where the sale is void in its inception the representative cannot coerce payment of the purchase money, and the purchaser may set up the invalidity of the contract without placing the representative in statu quo by a return of the property.⁵

On the other hand, various matters have been held not to relieve the purchaser from the payment of the purchase price.⁶

Overpayment. Where one bought property from an administrator and, through mutual mistake, paid for more articles than he received, the administrator obtained no title to the overpayment, and could convey none to the heirs.⁷

§ 317. Application of Proceeds

The proceeds of a sale of property of the estate should be applied for the benefit of the estate; and a representative who misapplies the proceeds will be responsible therefor, as will a purchaser with notice thereof. Assets recovered by creditors constitute a trust fund for payment of creditors and distribution.

The price of property sold, whether it is in cash or by the purchaser's note, and all other consideration or security realized, should be applied by the executor or administrator for the benefit of the estate in due course of law, and he will be held accountable accordingly;⁸ but the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the proceeds nor is he responsible for any misapplication thereof,⁹ unless he had at the time of payment reasonable ground for believing that the executor intended to misapply the money or was in the very transaction applying it to his own private use.¹⁰

Sale of property of third person. If an executor sells the property of another among the succession effects, the owner of such property is entitled to the proceeds of its sale, not by virtue of any privilege, but because of ownership thereof.¹¹

Assets recovered by creditors. Assets recovered by creditors of the estate by action against the representative and others for unfair or invalid sales have been held to constitute a trust fund for the payment of the creditors, and, if there should be a residue, for distribution.¹²

§ 318. Validity and Effect of Sale

In general a sale or transfer by a representative is presumed to be valid, particularly after a lapse of time; and the validity of particular sales has been adjudicated.

2. Property taken from purchaser

In an action on a note the purchaser may show that the property for which the note was given was taken out of his possession and sold under judgments against the estate, and that the consideration of the note thus failed.

Breach as to sale of good will precluding recovery of the portion of the price appertaining to the good will.—Ferris v. Pett, supra.

4. Miss.—Joslin v. Caughlin, 30 Miss. 502.

5. Ala.—Fambro v. Gantt, 12 Ala. 298.

6. Partner's refusal to accept purchaser

The refusal of a surviving partner to accept as a partner and continue the business with the purchaser of the interest of the deceased partner in the firm does not defeat the sale by the administrator of such interest, since the purchaser thereof was charged with knowledge of the law, and must be content with the right he acquired to share in the distribution of the firm's assets.—Currie v. Landis, 202 P. 893, 55 Cal. App. 73.

Acceptance of note of third person

Where an administrator takes the note of a third person, indorsed by the purchaser at the sale, and also the bond of the purchaser, and agrees to collect the note and apply the proceeds to the payment of the bond, the administrator's neglect in collecting the note, and a loss thereby, cannot relieve the purchaser from the payment of his bond, or the property from the statutory mortgage thereon.—Steger v. 12. Md.—Turk v. Grossman, 6 A.2d 639, 176 Md. 644.

It has been held that sales which would normally be void may be allowed to stand where the beneficiaries consent to such sale.

In the absence of any showing to the contrary it is presumed that an executor or administrator who has made a sale or transfer has exercised his power rightfully;¹³ and lapse of time accompanied with proof of possession under the sale will raise a presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings¹⁴ and cure informalities,¹⁵ although it cannot cure a total want of authority.¹⁶ Where personalty not owned by decedent but found among his chattels at the time of his death is sold the sale will usually be upheld and the right of the true owner limited to a recovery of the proceeds of sale or at most of such damages as will indemnify him;¹⁷ and the fact that personalty belonging to an estate is traded by the executor for real estate without authority does not prevent the purchaser from getting title to the personalty which is delivered to him.¹⁸ Where an administrator acquires possession of property previously disposed of by him at a private sale, conducted in his individual capacity, he may not set up as against his purchasers the invalidity of the sale made by himself.¹⁹

A sale of property by an agent appointed by a power of attorney made by an executor, but not authorized by will to be made, is illegal as against creditors.²⁰ A sale of the property by a person named as executor, but who did not qualify, is void as against an executor who did qualify;²¹ but where, under the existing law, an administrator has power to sell personalty, a sale by him is valid, although his letters are subsequently revoked on the admission of a will to probate.²²

Consent of beneficiaries. While a sale of personal property by an administrator without an order of court, where this is required, would be void as to distributees, if the distributees assent to it no one can complain, except perhaps creditors whose debts are unpaid or an administrator de bonis non seeking the property as assets to pay debts.²³ So also, where heirs authorized and concurred in a sale of shares of stock made by the administrator, they will not be heard to say that the sale was not necessary.²⁴

Fraud. Where a sale or assignment was procured by the fraud of the purchaser the sale is invalid, and subsequent purchasers, other than bona fide purchasers, acquire no title.²⁵

§ 319. Ratification of Sale; Laches

An unauthorized sale may be ratified by the court or the beneficiaries, or the right to attack the sale may be lost by laches.

An unauthorized sale of personalty may be ratified by sanction of, or confirmation by, the probate court,²⁶ or through the acquiescence of the beneficiaries.²⁷ Similarly the right to attack the sale may be lost through laches.²⁸ However, the representative cannot ratify a sale made by his own agent to the prejudice of creditors of the estate and others in interest.²⁹ Where no order of the court was necessary to authorize an executor to sell part of corporate stock, the only asset of the estate, to raise money to save the balance of the stock from forfeiture and to pay debts, the subsequent probate of the will in effect ratified the sale.³⁰

§ 320. Title and Rights of Purchaser

A purchaser from a representative having power to sell acquires good title even though the sale was not warranted, or constituted waste, unless he had notice of the facts; but he acquires no title where the representative lacked authority or the purchaser participated in fraud. The purchaser takes free of equities provided he was a bona fide purchaser for value. The rule of caveat emptor applies, and warranties will not be implied.

A purchaser at a sale by an executor or administrator having power to sell acquires a good title,³¹ even though the situation of the estate did not necessitate or warrant the sale³² or the representative was committing a fraud or devastavit on the estate,³³ unless he knew of the facts³⁴ or is chargeable with constructive notice.³⁵ Even the fact that the representative misapplies the proceeds does not prevent a purchaser for value and in good faith from acquiring a good title.³⁶

The purchaser acquires no title, however, where the sale was made without authority or in an unauthorized manner,³⁷ or where the sale is tainted with fraud by reason of collusion between himself and the representative;³⁸ nor is even a purchaser for value protected where the conveyance by the representative was in payment of his private debt.³⁹ In all such cases the distributees may recover the property,⁴⁰ although the representative is estopped by his own act from recovering the property by an action at law in his own name.⁴¹ Even where the circumstances were such that the sale was voidable and could be set aside, the sale remains in effect and the purchaser retains title until the sale is set aside by a proceeding for that purpose to which the purchaser has been made a party.⁴²

A bona fide purchaser for value of property sold by a representative takes the property discharged of all equities which attach on them,⁴³ but an assignee with notice takes subject to existing equities and set-offs;⁴⁴ and equity will follow the property into the hands of one who is not a purchaser for value,⁴⁵ or who, although he paid a valuable consideration, has been guilty of fraud and collusion with the representative to the injury of the estate.⁴⁶ The assignee of a cause of action already instituted by the administrator takes the cause of action subject to whatever set-offs, counterclaims, or defenses that would have been available against the original plaintiff.⁴⁷ A purchaser who accepts delivery or possession on condition that he shall acquire no title until payment of the price is estopped to repudiate such condition.⁴⁸

A purchaser who has paid the purchase money, which has been applied to the payment of debts and to exonerate other property, cannot be compelled to surrender the property because of an irregularity in the appointment of the administrator without the purchase money being first refunded.⁴⁹

Property not included in sale. The purchaser acquires only such property as the representative purports to sell.⁵⁰ Thus the purchaser of a chattel does not obtain title to money and other valuables which had been secreted therein by decedent and which none of the parties knew that it contained, but holds such money and valuables, on discovery thereof, as treasure trove for the personal representative of decedent.⁵¹

Warranties and representations. The usual rule of caveat emptor applies to a purchase of personality from an executor or administrator,⁵² and the general rule is that there is no implied warranty⁵³ of title,⁵⁴ or soundness,⁵⁵ or value,⁵⁶ although there is authority for the view that there is an implied warranty of soundness and title.⁵⁷ The representative may, however, make a warranty and thus bind himself personally,⁵⁸ but he cannot bind the estate by a warranty,⁵⁹ although it has been held that a breach of warranty is available as a defense in an action against the purchaser for the price.⁶⁰ The estate is not liable to a purchaser on the ground that the executor induced the purchase by false representations.⁶¹

Proof of purchase. Where deceased's widow asserts that she purchased from the administrator the right to look to the principal debtor for reimbursement on account of the payment of an obligation of such debtor under a guaranty contract, the burden is on the widow to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that she did in fact purchase such right, and where she fails to sustain such burden she is bound to account to the estate for the amount received from the principal debtor.⁶²

§ 321. Setting Aside Sale

Grounds for setting aside a sale include inadequacy of price where excessive or where coupled with other suspicious circumstances, although not otherwise, and fraud or collusion.

Mere inadequacy of price does not invalidate a sale of personality by an executor or administrator and is not in itself a sufficient ground for setting the sale aside,⁶³ unless the inadequacy is so gross as to indicate mistake or unfairness in the sale, for which the purchaser is responsible, or misconduct or fraud on the part of the administrator;⁶⁴ yet it may be considered in estimating the effect of any error, default, or dereliction on the part of the representative in selling the property,⁶⁵ and, where coupled with other suspicious circumstances or irregularities in the sale, may warrant setting the sale aside.⁶⁶

Fraud or collusion between the purchaser and the representative making the sale is sufficient ground for setting the sale aside.⁶⁷ Similarly the fact that the purchaser has chilled the bidding at a public sale may furnish ground for setting aside the sale;⁶⁸ and an unnecessary sale at which the representative becomes the purchaser may be set aside.⁶⁹ A sale may be avoided where the purchaser knew or had good reason to suspect that the sale was made with a design to misapply the funds.⁷⁰

It is not a ground for setting aside a conveyance that it was made to a creditor in payment of his debt, in the absence of a showing of unfairness or inadequacy of consideration.⁷¹

Proceedings. An action to avoid a sale by an executor or administrator for his own debt may be brought by creditors, legatees, or distributees.⁷² Unless there are exceptional circumstances,⁷³ the personal representative cannot attack his own sale on the ground that it was made without authority.⁷⁴ An offer of indemnity is unnecessary where a bill in equity is filed to set aside a purchase by the representative at his own sale;⁷⁵ and in a case where certain corporate stock belonging to plaintiff had been fraudulently sold by an executor, and the purchaser had received from the corporation thereon more than the amount received by plaintiff as the proceeds of the sale, plaintiff was not required to surrender anything as a condition to receiving a return of the stock.⁷⁶

Rules governing similar questions in civil proceedings generally have been applied, in proceedings to set aside a sale by an executor or administrator, to questions relating to parties,⁷⁷ pleading,⁷⁸ evidence,⁷⁹ and judgments, decrees, and orders.⁸⁰

§ 322. Liability of Representative

The liability of a representative in connection with the selling of property is dependent on whether he has acted with good faith, due diligence, and sound judgment. He is chargeable with the price realized; and will be charged with the actual or appraised value where he sells improperly for less than such value.

The usual rule requiring a representative to exercise good faith, due diligence, and sound judgment in the performance of his duties, see § 184 supra, applies in cases of sales by a personal representative;⁸¹ but where an administrator has used such a degree of intelligence as a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised he is not personally liable for selling personal property without the authorization of an order of court.⁸²

Where the representative sells property of the estate, he is chargeable with the price realized,⁸³ especially if the sale was made without authority.⁸⁴ Even though personal property may have been sold by the representative for less than its full value, he is not chargeable with more than the price actually realized where he has been guilty of no bad faith or negligence in the transaction;⁸⁵ but he is chargeable with the actual or appraised value where he sells for less without authority⁸⁶ or in an unauthor-

73. Representative's action held warranted

Where an administratrix having made an invalid assignment of a life policy belonging to the estate placed the policy in the hands of an attorney who stated he did not see how to prevent payments by the company to the assignee, and later retired without having brought suit, whereupon the administratrix employed other counsel, her former attorney's declaration did not estop her to set aside the transfer for fraud.—Empire Life Ins. Co. v. Mason, 78 S.E. 935, 140 Ga. 141.

76. U.S.—Smith v. Moore, Mont., 199 F. 689, 118 C.C.A. 127.

77. Widow

If the widow of an intestate is surviving she, as well as the heirs, should be made a party to an action to avoid a sale.—Stronach v. Stronach, 20 Wis. 129.

78. Alleging fraud

In a proceeding to set aside an administrator's sale of certain stock belonging to his intestate for fraud the petition must allege the facts constituting the fraud.—Chappell v.

Chappell, 99 S.W. 959, 124 Ky. 691, 30 Ky.L. 935.

79. Sufficiency

(1) Evidence held to support finding that executor's sale of testator's stock was made in good faith, without agreement permitting executor's participation therein.—Davis v. Smith, 239 N.W. 150, 184 Minn. 422.

(2) Evidence established that administrator sold trade-mark and good will connected therewith for inadequate price and without proper effort to ascertain value thereof; hence exceptions to sale were properly sustained.—Park & Tilford Import Corporation v. Nash, 171 A. 339, 166 Md. 373.

80. Res judicata

An order of surrogate's court which was not final but left alleged fraudulent sale of stock by executrix open to attack on accounting wherein creditors of estate could show any facts tending to establish that sale was made in fraud of creditors, was not res judicata in subsequent action in equity which was first proceeding instituted by creditor in which complete relief could be obtained by it.—American Equitable Corporation v. Parkhill, 299 N.Y.S. 284, 252 App.Div. 260.

Decree held erroneous

Where a creditor of an intestate's estate sought to set aside a sale and conveyance made by the administrator for the payment of debts on the ground of fraud, the administrator not being a party to the suit, but it did not appear that the suing creditor was the only creditor of the estate, a decree directing the payment to such creditor out of the proceeds of the sale was erroneous, but the proceeds should have been put in the hands of the administrator to be applied according to law under the supervision of the probate court.—State Bank v. White, 23 Mo. 342, 66 Am.D. 671.

ized manner,⁸⁷ where he is guilty of improperly making or conducting a sale at which less than the true or appraised value is realized,⁸⁸ or where he has failed to keep an account of the amount actually realized.⁸⁹

Distributees, who direct an administrator to sell personal assets of the estate at a private sale without order of the probate court, are bound by his action, where he acts in good faith, and cannot hold him liable for a greater sum than he obtained on the sale;⁹⁰ nor can distributees complain of an administrator's action in selling personal assets at private sale without order of court if they suffer no damage thereby.⁹¹ Where a representative acting in good faith has sold at what is apparently a fair price, he is not chargeable with profits made by the purchaser on a new sale shortly afterward.⁹² Where an executor sells property of the estate, together with property of his own, for a gross sum, a portion of which he receives, the amount received will be presumed to be on account of the property belonging to the estate.⁹³

An administrator cannot avoid liability for the sale price of property by pleading his failure to obtain a court order or to collect purchase price on the ground that the sale could therefore be avoided and the property recovered.⁹⁴

The liability of a representative for violations of particular duties relating to sales is also considered supra in §§ 305-317 in connection with the treatment of the particular duty involved; for example, the liability of a representative in connection with the taking of security for payment is considered supra § 312. The liability of a representative for loss resulting from the failure to sell, or delay in selling, the property of the estate where a sale is necessary to avoid depreciation is considered supra § 248.
